“That the board of directors of the mother bank shall publish in some paper at the seat of government each order which may be issued by any office or branch directing it to expand or contract its loans or discounts, or any other order, immediately after its issue, and shall report to the secretary of the treasury all such orders, to be reported to congress at the commencement of each session.”

The amendment was advocated by Messrs. Allen, Wright, Walker, Linn, Calhoun, Nicholson and Benton. Yeas 26, nays 25, yeas 23, nays 26.

Mr. Walker then moved to amend the bill by extending the directors or officers of the bank or branches, or members of congress, from obtaining any loans or discounts.

This amendment was debated for some time, Messrs. Bayard, Walker, Woodbury, Clay, of Ky. Berrien, Simmons, Clay, of Ala. King, Henderson and Allen participating.

The amendment was so modified as to limit directors to a sum not exceeding $10,000, and the question divided. On the first proposition in relation to officers of the bank with the limit named, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Henderson, McKelven, Merrett, Mouton, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

For the second part, viz: to exclude members entirely, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—22.

And then the senate adjourned.

July 10. The president laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of approving the progress under the commission for the settlement of our affairs with Mexico.

After some remarks from Mr. Linn and Mr. Preston, it was referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Clay presented a petition from a number of citizens of Barbour county, Alabama, stating the grievances they, in common with other citizens, labor under in consequence of the suspension by the banks; that their business was greatly embarrassed by the derangement of the exchanges, which ranged from fifteen to twenty per cent. between there and Augusta and Savannah, in Georgia. Mr. C. said he presented the petition with pleasure, in hope that the senate would be moved to see to it.

It was moved that it be laid on the table and printed: which was agreed to.

Mr. Preston presented a memorial from citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying the establishment of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Woodbridge presented two memorials from citizens of New York, in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Woodbridge presented a memorial in favor of a national bank.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the resolution submitted by Mr. Buchanan calling for the names of persons removed from office since the 4th of March last.

Mr. Linn being entitled to the floor, occupied it during the coming hour without concluding.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Woodbury moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision, prohibiting directors or stockholders from making any donations.

Mr. Clay moved so to amend it as to prohibit donations being made to officers of the bank.

Mr. Woodbury avowed his object to be that directors should not apply for the funds of government for any purpose, nor that donations should be made by the stockholders to officers of the bank.

There might be cases to call for the exercise of this power, but every such case should be laid before the stockholders, and he would not allow the directors to do so.

Mr. Clay said it was impossible to conceive of all the cases in human life where there might be calls for the exercise of this power. An officer in the institution, for instance, might be killed in his very endeavors to save the building from fire, and yet, according to the provision of the senator from New Hampshire, enough to save his family from starvation could not be granted until the annual meeting of the stockholders.

There were many other cases which might be cited to show the necessity of leaving the power where it was, only prohibiting donations to officers of the institution.

Mr. Woodbury would ask if the end of the tree, which might fall down and kill every man, would the officers have a right to put their hands into the treasury to relieve the families of persons so killed? It was very well to be charitable with our own money, but not with that belonging to the people, and he was unwilling to have public treasury put under the surveillance of the directors or stockholders.

Mr. Henderson would vote for the amendment to the amendment, but then he should vote against the whole. He held that the stockholders had no right under any circumstances to give away the funds of the institution.

Mr. Linn desired to reach the evil effectually. It was well known that donations had been made for internal improvements, and for many other things, by the late bank. There might be cases where directors and stockholders would be justified; but, if you gave them at all, it was certain to run into abuse, particularly where a bank was concerned.

The question was then taken on Mr. Clay's amendment to the amendment, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Clay then moved to amend the amendment to the effect that no donation made by the bank or its branches should be charged to the funds of the government.

On this motion a short debate ensued, and on the question being taken, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Allen then moved to amend the amendment to the effect that no donation made by the bank or its branches should be charged to the funds of the government.

On this motion a short debate ensued, and on the question being taken, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Clay then moved to strike out the stockholders from the amendment, thus leaving them the power to act.

After some remarks from Messrs. Calhoun, Benton, Woodbury, Clay, of Ky. Allen, Henderson, Clay, of Ala. and others, the question was taken on strike-out, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrett, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Allen then moved to amend the amendment to the effect that no donation made by the bank or its branches should be charged to the funds of the government.

On this motion a short debate ensued, and on the question being taken, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

The question was then taken on the amendment to Mr. Woodbury, as amended, and it was adopted.

[It provides, substantially, that no donations shall be made to the officers of the bank by the directors.]

Mr. Woodbury then moved to strike out from the 4th line of the bill, to the last section, the words “thirty millions.” On this motion, Mr. W. addressed the senate at very considerable length.

Mr. Clay replied. He had always been led to believe that the senator from New Hampshire was a matter-of-fact man; but now it appeared he had some parts in him, for he was for creating a bank without any capital at all.

Mr. Woodbury replied that the sub-treasury had no capital, and that the senator from Kentucky had always maintained that the sub-treasury was a government bank.

Mr. Archer would give his vote against the amendment, by which he did not mean to be understood as excluding him from voting for any other change of amount at another time.

The question was taken on the motion and decided in the negative.

Mr. Wright then moved to strike out that part of the bill which admits of the addition of 20 millions of capital.

Mr. W. sustained his motion chiefly on the ground that the capital ought to be stated and fixed; that if the stock rose some 5 or 10 per cent. above par, a rush would be made to increase the capital; and, on the other hand, if stock fell, the managers of the bank would be anxious to increase the capital by a new alliance.

Mr. Clay replied at some length, insisting that if the stock fell, it could be an evidence of the prosperity of the establishment and the expediency of increasing the capital.

The question was taken on the adoption of this amendment, and decided in the negative:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Clay asked if the senators on the other side had any further amendments to offer?

Mr. Wright said he had one or two more, and he presumed there were others of his friends that had some to offer.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after sometime spent therein, adjourned.

July 12. Mr. Tallmadge presented a petition of citizens of New York, for a bankrupt law.

He asked the indulgence of the senate, in a few remarks on the subject; and in a concise and powerful manner gave his views in favor of creating such a law, as required by the urgent and pressing wants of the country.

Mr. Walker had intended offering a resolution to proceed to the consideration of a bankrupt bill, immediately after definite action had been had on the bank bill; and he was pleased to see that there was a strong probability of aid from the other side of the senate. This was a measure infinitely more important to his constituents than any measure now pending before either house. There was nothing on which the public mind was so decided as on including banks. He believed the time was near when there would be a vast majority in both houses of congress and throughout the country in favor of a bankrupt law applicable to banks. He should vote for the bill, whether it was applicable to banks or not, and he believed it was demanded by the popular voice, and at the present session.

Mr. Linn regretted very much that he could not have had this morning to address the senate on another subject, but he might as well speak on this as on any. He had a petition on this subject which he should present. Every man whose heart was in the right place would see that it was right to liberate the debtor, upon giving up his property. But it was different to make a law which should accomplish this and not do so infinitely more harm to the mass of the community than benefit. He sympathized with those who were in distress; but called on to exercise an important duty here, he was compelled to look not only to the interests of his constituents, but also to the benefit of the whole country, and whether the operation of the law would not be of more injury to the great mass than of benefit to individuals. He would vote for a prospective bankrupt law, but not for one that did not embrace corporations.

Mr. Morehead said, although the people of his state had no peculiar interest in this subject, they held it as a great national measure which would exert a healing influence on the distress of the country, and as more especially a component part of the great system of reform with which the whole party was pledged to the union. The course of his colleague, (Mr. Clay), and of his predecessor, (Mr. Crittenden), who had at last session reported and ably defended a bill for this purpose, he genuinely concurred in, and should support a bill of this character, when brought before him.

The petition was then laid on the table; as also petitions of the same character, presented by Messrs. White, Linn, Pierce, Southard and Walker.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on the public lands, reported the pre-emption land distribution bill, from the house, with two amendments; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Tappan presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, containing a remonstrance against the charter of a national bank, the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, a protective tariff and the assumption of state debts. Which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The special order, the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States, was then taken up.

Mr. Wright offered an amendment to strike out that portion of the bill authorizing the subscription of one-third of the stock by government, and requiring it all to be taken by individuals and corporations.

A very interesting debate followed, in which Messrs. Wright, Calhoun, Linn, Walker, Allen and other participated.

The question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Fulkner, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mottion, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Ford, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Wright then moved to strike out from the 6th section of the bill that part which provides if the amount of stock to be taken by individuals or corporations, is not subscribed before the 26th December next, the secretary of the treasury shall subscribe for the residue, and be empowered to sell it afterwards at not less than cost.

This amendment also created a debate, in which Messrs. Wright, Clay and Buchanan participated.

The question was taken on this amendment; it was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Fulkner, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mottion, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Ford, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Wright then moved to strike out that part of the bill which allows the bank to go into operation after six millions shall have been subscribed, and to insert, "until the whole capital stock of the said bank shall have been paid in, as required by the provisions of the act."

The question being taken on this amendment, the vote stood:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Fulkner, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mottion, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then moved to add to the 6th section the following: "but until the sale of the stock so subscribed by the secretaries shall be made by him, the president shall appoint the additional number of directors to which the said stock would be entitled if held by individual directors." This amendment was opposed by Messrs. Clay, of Ky.

On the question being taken, there stood for it:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, King, Linn, Mottion, Nicholson, Pierce, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, offered a slight amendment, making it obligatory on the secretary of the treasury, to dispose of the stock which he may have subscribed for under the contingency in the bill, as soon as he can obtain not less than its par value; which was adopted without debate.

Mr. Wright submitted another amendment, to the effect that the directors should make no dividends except from the net profits; nor pay to the stockholders any part of the stock, nor reduce the capital without the consent of congress; which was adopted by a large majority.

July 13. The president laid before the senate a communication from the war department in relation to the removal of the raft on Red river.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, 60 additional copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Walker presented a petition from citizens of Mississippi, in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Kerr submitted a resolution in relation to changing the hour of meeting from 10 to 11 o'clock.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill submitted by the committee on the Mississippi, on the president for a list of all the persons removed from office since the 4th of March, 1841.

Mr. Linn occupied the morning hour without concluding his remarks.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Wright offered the following amendments:

"And if at any time such suspension of specie payments shall become general as to the liabilities of the bank above the amount of any class or portion of either of them, either at the said principal bank or at any one of the branches, offices or agencies thereof, it shall be the duty of the attorney general of the United States forthwith to make application to the circuit court of the United States, s. c. by bill or petition, in the nature of a proceeding in chancery, for an injunction to restrain the said principal bank and all the said branches, offices and agencies, wherever located, from making any further issue of bills, notes, drafts or other securities for the payment of, and collected and intended to circulate as money, and from all transfers of property, sales, purchases, or of any other transactions of business, which may endanger or impair the security of the creditors of the said bank, of its class or description; and for the appointment by the said court, or the said chief justice, as the case may be, of a trustee, or trustees to take possession, the supervision, care, and charge of the property, effects, and rights, books, papers, and all other things belonging to the said bank and the branches, offices and agencies thereof, and all money, goods and securities deposited therein, to whomsoever the same may of right belong. And the said court shall, upon the filing of such bill or petition, have the same equity jurisdiction of the whole matter; and, in case the said corporation or any one of the trustee or trustees so appointed by the said court, or the said chief justice, as the case may be, fail to resume specie payments in full at the said principal bank, and all the branches, offices and agencies thereof, within the space of — days from the day of such suspension, and to continue such specie payments without further interruption or suspension, then the said court shall proceed to order the transfer, both of possession and property, of all the property and effects of the said corporation, of the said bank, and of character whatever, to the trustee or trustees aforesaid, to be perfected, and to have all the business of the said corporation finally closed under its order and direction, and the charter forfeited and annulled. And before any dividend shall be made from the said property, as the aforesaid thereof, to the creditors, of the said corporation, all the expenses incurred under the direction of the said court in pursuance of the provisions of this section of this act, as allowed and taxed by the said court, or the said chief justice thereof, shall be first paid; and when the dividends are made, the creditors of the said corporation shall be preferred in the following order, viz:

"The holders of the bills, notes and other paper of the said corporation, issued and intended to circulate as money, and actually so circulated, and used, shall be first fully paid according to the provisions of this section.

"The public deposits of the United States shall next be fully paid according to the same rule.

"The private depositors of the said bank shall be next fully paid according to the same rule.

"All the other creditors of the said corporation, the stockholders, excepted, shall next be fully paid according to the tenor and effect of their respective contracts, bills, and obligations against the said corporation.

"All the stockholders of the said corporation, the United States included, shall be next paid the nominal value of the stock held by them respectively, in case the fund remaining in charge of the said court, over and above expenses, shall be equal to such payment.

"And lastly, any balance of the said fund which may remain after the payment of all expenses, as taxed and allowed by the said court, and making all the payments herein before directed, shall be paid into the treasury of the United States for the use of the said states."

On this question a debate of interest ensued, in which Messrs. Wright, Berrien, Buchanan, Benton, Clay, of Ala., and others participated.

The question being then taken on the adoption of the amendment, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Fulkner, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mottion, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Summons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

The senate then adjourned.

July 14. Mr. Clay presented a memorial from many citizens of New York, in favor of a bankrupt law.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Kerr, in relation to changing the hour of meeting from 10 to 11 o'clock, was then taken up.

After some few remarks from Messrs. Clay, Benton, Huntington, Kerr and Sevier, the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. Merrick, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported, with amendments, a bill to revive and extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Clay, from the committee on finance, reported the bill from the house of representatives, authorizing a loan of twelve millions of dollars, without amendment.

The bill from the house of representatives making appropriation for the payment of navy pensions, was then read and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

The bill from the house of representatives making an appropriation for the purchase of naval ordnance and ordinance stores, was twice read and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

The bill from the house of representatives making further provision for the insane paupers of the District of Columbia, was twice read and referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the petition offered by Mr. Buchanan, calling on the president for a list of removals.

Mr. Linn occupied the remainder of the morning hour, without finishing his remarks.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to amend the bill by adding to the fourteenth section the following: "Provided, however, That if the said bank or any of its branches shall at any time suspend specie payments, or neglect or refuse to discharge on demand any and all of its liabilities to specie, then its bills or notes shall no longer be received in payment of any debt or demand due the United States."

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, thought that provided for in the bill, but moved to amend the amendment to the effect that no notes should be so received during the time of suspension.

On this amendment to the amendment a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Clay, of Ala. Calhoun and Allen severally opposed it.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Preston, Freneau, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Coulbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, Young—31.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then desired to withdraw his amendment, considering that its object was defeated by the amendment made.

On this a debate arose in which Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Sevier and others participated.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the amendment could not be withdrawn.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. then moved to amend his own amendment, so as to insert:

"And such suspension of specie payments shall be held and adjudged ipso facto a forfeiture of the charter hereby granted."

This was opposed on the ground that it was too summary a proceeding, declaring it to be ipso facto a forfeiture. And after some debate, Mr. Benton suggested a modification to the effect that such suspension should be considered cause of forfeiture.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then accepted the modification, and the yeas and nays having been called, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Preston, Freneau, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Young—43.

NAYS—None.

The question was taken on the amendment as amended, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Kerr, King, Linn, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Nicholson, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Freneau, Preston, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Young—41.

NAYS—None.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then moved to amend the 16th section of the bill by adding a provision to the effect that if the bank or any of its branches shall suspend specie payments, then the secretary of the treasury is to remove the deposits from said bank or branches and place them in some safe special depository state bank.

The amendment occasioned a debate in which Messrs. Clay, Linn, Sevier and other participated.

At the suggestion of Mr. Clay the amendment was so modified as to read that if any suspension shall take place during the recess of congress, then the secretary of the treasury was to have power to make such temporary disposition of the funds as in his discretion might be deemed expedient.

The modification was accepted and the amendment adopted.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. then moved so to amend the bill as to strike out 12 per cent. which the bank was held responsible for during a state of suspension, and insert 25 per cent.

This amendment was warmly opposed by Mr. Huntington, and as warmly advocated by Mr. Sevier.

The question being taken on its adoption, it was decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Mouton, Nicholson, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Freneau, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Benton then moved to strike out from the bill that part which provides that no other bank shall be established during the continuance of the present bank.

This amendment was decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Freneau, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Benton then moved an amendment to the effect that, if any committee of congress should be refused means of inspecting the books and proceedings of the said corporation, it should be considered cause of forfeiture of the charter.

In this amendment the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Freneau, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Benton then moved an amendment which would strike out the 6 per cent. allowed the bank on its loans and discounts, and insert 5.

This amendment was opposed by Messrs. Huntington and Mangum.

And, the question being taken, there appeared as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, McKim, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Freneau, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Clay inquired if senators had offered all their amendments; if so, he was about to suggest that the bill be printed, as amended, and in the mean time to take up the loan bill.

Mr. Calhoun was understood to say that he had one or two to offer.

Mr. Walker also observed that he had one of some importance to offer.

Mr. Calhoun expressed the hope that they might get through the amendments by Saturday.

On motion, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, July 9. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. White, of Louisiana, requested the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore), to suspend the motion for a moment, to enable him to make a report.

Mr. Fillmore having assented, Mr. White, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill "to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

Mr. W. said that, in obedience to the expressed sense of the committee, he would ask of the house an order for the immediate engrossment of the bill. The question was taken, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

In leave given, memorials were presented by Messrs. Faneuil and Neward, and appropriately referred.

This house then resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. J. G. Floyd, and which is in the following words:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house, if not incompatible with the public service, whether any officer of the army or the attorney general of the United States has, since the 4th March last, been directed to visit the state of New York for any purpose connected with the imprisonment or trial of Alexander McLeod; and whether, by any executive measures or correspondence, the British government has been given to understand that Mr. McLeod will be released or surrendered; and, if so, to communicate to this house copies of the instructions so to report of such officer.

Mr. Hunt proceeded to address the house. He entered into a history of the affair of the Caroline, with a view of defending the route of the present administration. He endeavored to show the question stood when, with all its attendant and accumulated difficulties, it was handed over to them. Mr. H. had not concluded when the morning hour expired.

On motion of Mr. King, of Georgia, it was resolved that the diagram accompanying the report made by him yesterday, in relation to a home squadron, be printed.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Bragg moved the question stood when, with all its attendant and accumulated difficulties, it was handed over to them. Mr. H. had not concluded when the morning hour expired.

The pending question being on the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Pickens then addressed the committee during the hour in urgent opposition to the bill.

Mr. Sergeant next addressed the committee in favor of the bill. Mr. Rhet, replied.

Mr. Freuden followed in defence of the bill. [For this debate see page 311.]

Mr. Freuden having concluded, the chairman gave the floor to Mr. Sallottail who was proceeding to address the committee, but yielded the floor (by request) to Mr. Dawson, who, remarking that it was now 12 o'clock, moved that the committee rise. Which motion prevailed. The committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And the house adjourned.

Friday, July 9. The resolution calling for information as to the case of McLeod, was taken up as the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. Hunt resumed his remarks and finished them.

Mr. Brown, of Tennessee, began a speech against the course of the secretary of state, and continued until interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. Fillmore moved a resolution to take the loan bill out of committee on Monday next. The resolution was passed—yeas 97, nays 79.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the bill authorizing a loan of $12,000,000.—Mr. Briggs having the chair, and Mr. Sallottail having the floor.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the committee rose till half past twelve, on the late and present administration of the finances of the country,—the embarrassments of the treasury, and the expediency and necessity of the loan.

Mr. Wise followed, briefly, against the bill. He said he rose to speak emphatically "no Duncan." He promised to attack the funding system in detail, but closed after only eight minutes of emphatic discourse.

Mr. Waterson addressed the committee against the bill; he repeatedly called to order by the chairman, but claimed the right to occupy his hour as he pleased "with random cuts," &c.

Mr. Fernando Wood made some objections to the third section, on the ground that it would lead to the employment of Wall street brokers as agents.

Mr. Cushing spoke in favor of the bill, replying in detail to various attacks on the bill and the report of the secretary of the treasury.

Mr. Eastman followed against the loan, and in defence of the present money system.

Mr. McKoon then spoke for an hour against the distribution bill.

Mr. Barnard addressed the committee for something short of an hour, in favor of the measure, entering into a review of the financial condition of the country. In order to demonstrate the necessity of making this loan. The debt which existed was said, a government debt, whoever might have created it, and it was the intention of the party now in power to pay it.

Mr. McKoon, of North Carolina, having obtained the floor, the committee, on motion of his colleague, (Mr. Slane), rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house ordered the printing of 1,000 extra copies of certain documents before referred to. And the house adjourned.

Saturday, July 10. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The house then resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. J. G. Floyd, calling for information as to the case of McLeod.

Mr. Brown, of Tenn. resumed his remarks from yesterday in favor of the resolution.

Mr. Linn, of N. Y. briefly addressed the house on the subject of the resolution, deprecating the attempt to make political capital out of it to grave a question, and any interference with the negotiations, in its present condition, as unnecessary and dangerous.

tion to the additional estimates of appropriations required by that department.

Mr. Fillmore supposing, he said, that the communication relating to the fortification bill, moved it be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and be printed. Which motion was agreed to.

The speaker also laid before the house a communication for the information of the house, in the form of a report from Mr. Hasler, on the subject of the standing weights and measures.

On motion of Mr. Morgan, the communication was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The house, on motion of Mr. Wise, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, in the chair), and took up the bill to provide for the payment of navy pensions.

Mr. McKay offered an amendment limiting, to a certain extent, the operation of the pension law, and providing for the repeal of the act of 1837 after the first day of January next.

This amendment was debated at some length, by Messrs. Wise, McKay, C. Johnson, Tillaghost and others.

Mr. Mallory moved to amend the amendment offered by Mr. McKay, by striking out all of it save that clause which want to repeal the act of 1837.

After some remarks by Messrs. Wise, Clifford, Tillaghost and Ward, the question on the amendment offered by Mr. Mallory, viz: to strike out all the amendment moved by Mr. McKay, save the repeal of the law of 1837.

Mr. Mallory explained at some length the reasons for his amendment.

Mr. McKay thereupon consented to accept it as a modification of his amendment.

And the question now being on the amendment, as modified—Mr. Mallory went into some further statements as to the effects of the law of 1837. A man who had entered on board a man of war, twenty years ago, and served but one month, died to-day, and his widow and children were instantly entitled to demand his pension for twenty years back, and it could not be refused. Should a law like this remain on the statute book?

The question being now put, the amendment was agreed to, yeas 70, nays not counted. So the law of 1837 was repealed.

Mr. Cure Johnson now offered an amendment, providing in substance, that no officer should receive, including his pension, a sum to exceed the full pay of his grade in the navy.

Mr. McKay wished to substitute an amendment, declaring that, while he received his pay from government, a man could draw no pension.

Messrs. Wise and Burnell opposed the amendment, Mr. C. Johnson spoke in support of it; when the question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to, yeas 61, nays 62.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the house.

On motion of Mr. Wise, the committee then took up the bill making an appropriation for the purchase of naval ordnance and ordinance stores, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKay moved to reduce the appropriation to three hundred thousand dollars.

A debate ensued on this proposition in which Messrs. Davis, Tilden, and Messrs. Wise, McKay and McKay participated, after which Mr. McKay withdrew his amendment, reserving to himself the right to offer it again in the house.

Mr. Williams, of Connecticut, moved to amend that bill so as to take the existing pension to widows and children of officers and seamen should be continued for five years, as though the law of 1837 had not been repealed.

Mr. McKay asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Williams, of Md. moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until this day week.

The motion to postpone was sustained by Messrs. Adams and Tillaghost, and opposed by Mr. Wise, who moved the previous question.

Mr. Williams, of Md. then moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. Cure Johnson moved that the house do now adjourn; which motion, by yeas 62, nays 89, was rejected. So the house refused to adjourn.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Williams, to lay the bill and amendments on the table, it was taken and decided in the negative. So the bill was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken, (being, first, on concurring in the amendment of the amendment, as proposed by Mr. Williams, of Connecticut).

Mr. Snyder, of Pennsylvania, asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

A motion was made that the house do now adjourn; which was rejected.

And the question recurring and was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and was decided in the affirmative, yeas 64, nays 63.

And the question recurring on concurring in the amendment, as amended, Mr. Dawson asked the yeas and nays which were ordered.

And the question on concurring in the amendment as amended, was then taken and decided in the negative, yeas 54, nays 96. So the amendment, as amended, was not concurred in.

And the bill was then ordered to a third reading at this time; and having been read a third time, and the question being on the final passage thereof.

Mr. McKay moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to report a section repealing the act of 1837.

Mr. Wise moved the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question, (being on the passage of the bill, the previous question cutting off the bill), was ordered to be taken, and, being taken, was decided in the affirmative, without a division. So the bill was passed.

The house adjourned. On leave given, petitions and memorials were presented by Messrs. Greig, Boone, Hunt, Young, King and Moore, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

The house then resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. J. C. Floyd, relating for information as to the case of McLeod.

Mr. Young, of New York, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the house generally on the subject of the resolution. And Mr. Y. having concluded, Mr. Morgan obtained the floor, but the request of Mr. Fillmore, waived his right to the floor for this day.

Mr. Fillmore, (by unanimous consent), from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill in relation to duties on drabbecks; which, having been read twice by its title, was referred, on motion of Mr. F. to the committee of the whole on the state of the union and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Wise, the bill making appropriations for the purchase of ordnance and ordinance stores, (yesterday reported up by the committee of the whole), was then taken up, and passed without debate and without a division.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Gilmer in the chair, and took up the bill appropriating $789,210 for the support of a home squadron.

Messrs. King and Wise stated the objects of the bill.

Mr. King moved that the committee rise, as the printed documents relative to the subject had not yet been received from the printer.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 87, nays 80.

The following message was received from the president of the United States, through John Tyler, jr. esq. his private secretary, which, by general consent, the speaker laid before the house:

To the speaker and members of the house of representatives.

In compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 21st ultimo, I have the honor to submit the accompanying communication from the secretary of state.

Washington, July 14, 1841.

Department of state, Washington, July 12, 1841.

To the president of the United States:

The secretary of state, to whom has been referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 21st ultimo, requesting the president "to communicate to that house (if in his opinion the same can be done consistently with the public interests) such authentic information as may be in his possession in relation to the seizure of American vessels by British armed cruisers, under the pretence that such vessels were engaged or intended to engage in the slave trade; together with any steps which may have been taken by our government or its ministers upon that subject; and, also, copies of all correspondence between the governments of the U. States and of Great Britain, since the 3d of March, 1837, relating to the African slave trade, not communicated with the message of the president of the U. States of the 3d of March last, and of all those parts of the despatches from Nicholas P. T. Trist, consul of the United States of the Havana, to the department of state, not contained in the said message of the 3d of March last," has the honor to report to the president the accompanying papers in answer to that resolution. Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

On motion of Mr. Stanly, the message and accompanying documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house then went again into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Winthrop in the chair.

Mr. Wise moved to take up the bill making appropriations for the support of a home squadron.

Mr. Fillmore objected. He had made the motion with a view to take up the "bill making appropriations for the purchase of ordnance, and for suppressing Indian hostilities."

Mr. Wise insisted on his motion; and it was negatived by the committee, yeas 55, nays 70.

The committee then took up the fortification appropriation bill, which was read.

Mr. Clifford inquired whether the committee intended to move any amendment to appropriate for fortifications in the state of Maine.

Mr. Fillmore said they did not. The estimates for new fortifications in the state of Maine had been referred to the committee on military affairs for examination.

The bill was then read, section by section, for amendments.

Mr. Toland moved to amend the section appropriating $30,000 for Fort Delaware, by striking out the condition which required the title to the land on which the fort was to be erected. He urged it as an unconstitutional appropriation, at some length. He gave a history of the legislation and litigation on the contested title, in the different states of Pennsylvania, Delaware and N. Jersey, all of which claimed the original right to the island in question.

A prolonged debate ensued on the subject. Mr. Fillmore opposed the amendment. Mr. J. W. Jones said it was out of order by the rules. The chairman decided it was out of order. An appeal was taken, but withdrawn. The original question was then resumed. Messrs. Sergeant, Rodney, Randolph, C. Brown, Holmes, Wise, Ingraham, McKay, J. W. Jones, Fillmore, Halstead and Gamble, debated the question at length.

Mr. Halstead moved to amend by ordering the appropriation on condition that the U. States should acquire the title in some way. Rejected.

Mr. Gamble moved to amend by striking out the whole appropriation. Passed.

Mr. Clifford moved an amendment appropriating $6,600 for fortifications at Fort Preble, on Portland harbor, in the state of Maine. He supported his amendment briefly.

Messrs. Fillmore and McKay opposed the amendment.

After some conversation between Messrs. Briggs, McKay, Clifford and Fillmore, the committee rose on motion of Mr. Clifford, and the house adjourned at ten minutes before three o'clock.

CHRONICLE.

BUTTER AND CHEESE to the value of $10,497,033 were made in the state of New York during the last year.

COAL TRADE. Two thousand and sixty-four coal boats, laden with anthracite coal, averaging 54 tons each, have passed the Fairmount weight locks since opening of the navigation, to the 31st inst. Two hundred and 42 of these were for New York.

The shipments from the Schuylkill region, during the week ending on Thursday, amounted to $1,692 tons. This is without precedent in quantity in a single week, in the history of the Schuylkill coal trade.

COAL LAW RETRICTIONS. A statement published in the London papers, showing the number of petitions for and against the repeal of the coal laws, sent in to parliament previous to the 4th June, as follows:

For repeal of the coal laws	2,910	860,494
Against	1,327	80,336
For proposed measure on coal laws	75	33,235
Against	1	134

COTTON CARS. The Red River Whig says: We were informed by some gentlemen from Bayou Boe that the week that the Bull-snow had made its appearance in their cotton fields, had already done considerable damage. Indeed, they said that they dreaded it more than the caterpillar.

COTTON is in livelier demand, though no material variation has taken place in prices, since our last quotation.

DEATHS during the last week in the city of New York 117, of whom 14 were of consumption and 6 of small pox; 74 were carried, 26 from Ireland and 19 other foreigners.

The Belvidere (Warren, county, N. J.) Apollon of Tuesday, mentions the death of John Linn, in the 105th year of his age. He was a native of Maryland, and emigrated to N. Jersey about 60 years ago.

FIERY FLYING SERPENT. Mr. N. M. Ward, a gentleman connected with the mission at Fedong, on the coast of Sumatra, has published a well illustrated account of flying serpents, seen by the narrator. He saw the animal fly from a tree at the height of fifty or sixty feet to another tree some forty fathoms distant. It supports itself in the air by drawing in its belly, widening its wings, and forming an arch as far as the eye can extend, and forces itself ahead with the rapidity of a bird, by sinuous motions, like a serpent swimming. There is nothing in the report which bears any resemblance to a flying serpent, as it is described by the narrator. Its length is about four feet, and but a dangerous. Another description of flying or darting serpents, is described by the natives, whose tale is instant danger. It leaps into the air, and is as swift as the wind, and makes none of the sinuous, waving motion in the air. This discovery, of the truth of which there can be no doubt, shows that the portion of Scripture which reads "And the serpent shall devour man," is a literal fact for the basis of its figurative language, though the species is now extinct in the region spoken of in the Bible. What a terrible scourge must be such animals! Give us the morality of the fowler, rather than the ferocity of the torrid zones, with such drawbacks. Polar bears are more agreeable than flying serpents. (New York Teller.)

FLOOD is dull at our last quotation or may be said to have declined a shade, say from 6 to 12 cents in each of the principal cities.

FLORIDA. Our readers will learn with great pleasure that intelligence has been received at the department of war, showing at once the activity and zeal of the troops engaged in the Florida war, and the enterprise of the intelligent and efficient officer, col. Worth, who now commands them.

On the 21st ultimo five columns, fully equipped to operate by land and water, were dispatched to the mouth of the river. The first, (under Capt. Clarke), moving from Fort Brooke towards Fort Cooper, on the Withlacoochee, around the coast of that tract, and on to the mouth of the river, where they found six large, several extensive planting grounds, all of which were destroyed and some canes, cattle, hogs, &c. were secured. Several Indians were also captured. The second column, (under lieutenant col. Riley), with canoes, penetrated the Charly a pukka, found the enemy's islands and planting grounds, and destroyed the latter, which were quite extensive. A third column, (under lieutenant col. Leonard), moved from Fort Cooper, a fourth, (under captain Kerr), is operating on the Oklawaha river, which had been ascertained as far as Fort Fowling as a fifth, (under captain Kerr), is on the Housatonic and in vicinity of the mouth.

By these combined and simultaneous movements it is not doubted that the enemy's strongholds and planting grounds, not already destroyed, will be visited, and the whole extensive district of country between the Gulf and the St. John's, south of Micanopy, and north of Tampa Bay, will be traversed with effect by the troops, and to the great advantage of the United States.

Courteous and his band, who, our readers may recollect, were captured some time since, and sent to N. Orleans, have been accordingly sent to the hands of col. Worth, to Florida, where it is contemplated to use him in the future conduct of the war.

We wish the gallant commander, and the army under him, the success which their joint zeal and efforts deserve. Not. 1st.

HAIL STORMS. The fourth of July had as deluged and bafled a temperature as our climate is never bleomed not during the day and night. The storm was accompanied by a heavy clared with electricity and vapors. Splendid preparations were made for exhibiting fire works that day, but the storm was so violent that the preparations for the occasion were dispersed like a routed army by the torrent of rain that descended, leaving none to witness the mimic pagant, so disannulled by contrast with the sublime fire works of an Almighty God.

The cloud seems to have concentrated its materials over a part of the state of Pennsylvania, which descended in tornado over a part of York county since the middle of the day. The storm was preceded by Dublin gap passing south of Carlisle. In a tract of from one and a half to five miles in width, hail descended in extraordinary size, and in some places to the depth of two feet. The destruction was terrific—the crops trodden, fences destroyed, barns unroofed and the country utterly desolated on many of the farms. At Baltimore the distant cloud wore a splendid appearance, but did not visit us.

ICE. A simple and effectual mode of keeping ice is mentioned in the Kentucky Farmer. The author says:

Take, at sun rise, from the ice house, as much ice as will probably be wanted through the day and cover it up in some saw-dust placed in a barrel which sits in the dairy house. At night, the size of any given and new source perceptibly diminished. If any quantity, away with your half ton of lumber, charcoal and zinc, with which you are bungled under the name of "refrigerator."

The Frankfort Commonwealth adds that he has tried the method here recommended, and that it answers perfectly.

INDIAN WARRIORS. The Little Rock papers notice the death of Tobe Mingo, a celebrated warrior, who died on the 10th inst. of cholera. He was a Choctaw chief. He has fought in nine battles for the United States, has served his country faithfully, and has been for many years a pensioner of the nation.

IRON ARROWS. There is a British vessel in the port of London whose standing rigging is made of iron wire.

PRESIDENT KIRKLAND. We learn from the Lexington, (Ky.) Intelligencer that six hundred dollars have been raised among the students of Harrison college, for the purpose of erecting a monument over the grave of President Kirkland.

MCCLEOD CASE. In supreme court, July 10, 1841. The people ex. Alexander M. McCleod. The prisoner, Alexander McCleod, having at the last May term been brought into court by the sheriff of the county of Niagara, for the purpose of being committed to the custody of the sheriff of the county of New York, pending the consideration of the motion for the prisoner's discharge; and the court being now ready to render the judgment in the premises, it is thereupon ordered that the sheriff of the county of New York have the body of the said Alexander McCleod in this court, at the academy in Utica, without unnecessary delay.

(A copy.) H. DEMO, clerk. NEW HAMPSHIRE LEGISLATURE. The legislature of New Hampshire adjourned at six o'clock on the morning of Saturday 31 July, after a session of thirty-two days. They passed in that time sixty-four acts and thirty-one resolves.

PAIXHAM GUNS, says the Charleston Courier, are to be mounted at the forts in that harbor. They will project shells of 40 to 50 lbs. weight, and solid shot of double that weight.

ANOTHER REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIER GOES. The Philadelphia press mentions the death of Mr. Joseph Stremlach, of that city. He was a soldier of the revolution, and participated in several of the struggles in the "times that tried men's souls." In later years he was a member of the legislature of the state, and sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, the duties of which he discharged with honor to himself and benefit to his constituents.

RAIL ROAD. The original capital of the Syracuse and Utica rail road company was $800,000; the cars were put on the track, since which time it has from earnings increased to $1,000,000—some $200,000 in dividends of 4 per cent, and will pay another dividend of 43 per cent, on the 1st of August proximo—making in all 37 per cent, net earnings in 25 months.

MR. D. WHITE, of Mount Pleasant, Jefferson county, Ohio, has returned to his native place, after his return from Nashville, Tennessee, where he has established a silk factory with two looms, now in constant and successful operation. There has been a large amount of commerce raised in Tennessee, and although this factory purchases all its raw materials of manufacturing them permit, there are still 2,000 bolls ready for the manufacturer, which sell generally at 10 cents per pound.

Dr. W. has made some important improvements in his machinery for preparing silk; and proposes to locate his factory in the city of Nashville, where the business here, should be more with any advantage. We are glad to see, as the legitimate silk business has enriched every community that has taken hold of it. Dr. W. by the way, was clad in a complete suit of silk, frock coat, vest and pantaloons, which, six weeks ago, was in the millinery line of the city. (Cincinnati Republican.)

TRADE OF SALEM. The Salem Register says many of the merchants of that city, trade to places visited by few, and in many cases, no other vessels under the sun. An incident which occurred to one of our national vessels, and accordingly the first question by the officers of the natives was, "are you from Salem?" And in all subsequent intercourse, when any other place was spoken of, the inquiry invariably was, "How near Salem is it?"

STEAMBOATS. The St. Louis Republican says that as the steamboat Monsoon was descending the river on the 23rd ult. she took fire over the boilers, and, for a short time certain and sudden destruction appeared to be her doom. Her boiler burst, and she was hurled with the steam up and engine in motion, she ran upon a bar, when the passengers landed. By the untimely aid of the pilot, the vessel was saved, and the fire was extinguished, however, with no material damage, and in a short time she was extricated, her boiler repaired, and she proceeded on her voyage.

Steamboats are not the only means of a regular transaction, says the Buffalo Penny Press, in regard to the abduction of the splendid steamer Milwaukee. It seems there are several owners, some of which reside in Milwaukee and some in this city. Those in the former place have been to great expense without receiving any dividend. Some difficulty, in regard to insurances, occurring, the latter prevailed from running. The owners here bore her to Mr. Sears of this place who placed her in the combination and she was laid up. This proceeding displeased the owners up the river, who procured the vessel, and the company got on a scow-load of wood, passed her boilers full, and during Saturday night got up steam, cast off lines and by day break were nearly out of sight, leaving the ship here as a wreck.

STAMMERING. Interesting surgical operation. We witnessed one of the most gratifying and successful surgical acts, yesterday, in the almost immediate cure of two most inveterate stammerers. The operation was performed by Dr. Leitch, of Green street, in the presence of several medical gentlemen. The first patient was 26 years old, and stammered badly. He sat in a chair, with his head down, and the operator severed, with a pair of scissors, the membrane which the tongue, attached to the lower jaw, immediately lay off the front teeth. The speech of the patient was immediately improved, notwithstanding a habit of thirty years standing. The other patient was 25 years old, and was so badly afflicted as scarcely to be understood in speaking; the effort to do so was accompanied by a convulsive movement of the whole face. This operation occupied about one minute—the patient having a large spool of blood only, and showing no symptoms of pain. The effect was almost magical. Notwithstanding long habit, the speech of the patient flowed freely and naturally, and the spasms of the face nearly ceased. It is gratifying to witness the progress of science in alleviating the afflictions of mankind.

(N. Y. Herald.) SPOOLS. No variations worthy of insertion since our last report.

SCOTCH. In the amount of 10,093,991 lbs. was made of the maple last year in the state of New York.

Tobacco crop. The Nashville Whig noticing the complaints in regard to the tobacco crop of the states, says: We are pleased to have it in our power to say that no such complaints are introduced in Tennessee. The process of transplanting, though somewhat backward, has been so far accomplished as to ensure a much larger crop, throughout the state, than was ever before obtained. The season is so far advanced in the cultivation of tobacco, the present year, both in Middle Tennessee and the western district, we are inclined to estimate at double the quantity of any previous season.

UPPER WINDS. The New Orleans Advertiser of the 10th inst. says that the city suffering under the blasts of the upper winds, the foremen of the epidemic disease, unless they are driven back by the south winds. They blow from the northeast, and during the time the city is under the influence of the upper winds, the sun shines with a burning fire, which sooner shows their effect upon the human system.

UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA. The Richmond Whig states that Mr. Syrester, of London, has been elected professor of mathematics in the university of Virginia.

WHAT is usual, advanced in price just before harvest. It begins now to recede in the price of the new crop being soon brought to market.

YELLOW FEVER AT HAVANA. Mr. Fisher, of Rhode Island, second engineer of the steam ship Lion, and Joseph Hutchinson, of Lowell, Mass. belonging to the same vessel, were on board the ship. The engineers of the steamship Egle were down with it.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The Gunard steamer Calcedonia, capt. McClellan, arrived at Boston on Saturday the 19th inst. at one o'clock P. M. having left Liverpool on the 4th inst. and made the passage in 13 days, bringing files of London papers to the 4th inst. and Liverpool to the 3d; the 4th day on which she sailed being Sunday.

The English papers speak of the crops as being generally very promising both in Great Britain and on the continent. The distress from want of work in the manufacturing districts of England was not so great as at the last previous articles.

The Scotch papers say—"The weather continues delightful, and our luxurious fields are careering on. In all quarters Providence is showering goodness on the land."

The news by the overland mail from India was received in London, July 1, by express from Madras. As we anticipated, it embraces nothing of a late date from China. The latest date is to March 30. Some few additional particulars relative to the state of trade are given, which will be found among our extracts. The news from India is even more important. The British government brig Larne was at Bombay, awaiting the arrival of the admiral from the Cape of Good Hope, who had not yet made his appearance. Preparations were making to send Laraca to Canton, and additional troops from Madras.

The news from Turkey and Egypt is of more interest. The most important particulars will be found in the ensuing extracts.

The Calcedonia brought 74 passengers; among whom was Samuel Jaudon, esq. His family did not return with him.

The Acadia arrived home on the morning of the 29th June, to ten and a half days from Halifax.

The Great Western had not arrived at Bristol—16 days out.

The President. Every vestige of hope for the safety of the President had flown.

Trade in the manufacturing districts of England was better. Cotton had improved in demand, and had, in price for American descriptions. Very little change in corn.

Money in London was taken 6 per cent. per annum, and many heavy failures had placed place.

Losses in France. Losses rendered from £18,000,000 to 9,000,000 in consequence of the extent of the Austrian loan.

The stock of bullion in the bank had increased £7,000.

The President's message was received on the 23d, but did not seem to excite much interest.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Prorogation and dissolution of parliament. The session of parliament was prorogued by the queen in person by a speech from the throne.

In the house of lords, Tuesday June 22d, the political circumstances connected with the prorogation had their effect in bringing together an immense assemblage. From the moment the royal carriage passed through the gates of Buckingham palace, until its arrival at the house of lords, the enthusiasm of the immense multitude that crowded every spot from which a glimpse of the procession could be had, was unabated. Within the house of lords the assemblage of peers and strangers was even greater than upon the occasion of the opening of the first parliament under the present reign. The body of the house, the galleries, the staircases, the very doorways, were crowded. There were a considerable number of peers present. The duke of Sussex entered the house about a quarter before two, and looked in excellent health and spirits.

Vol. X.—No. 21.

He was followed, some minutes afterwards, by the duke of Cambridge and prince George, and, until the guns announced her majesty's arrival, both of the royal dukes were engaged in animated conversation with the peers around them. Lords Melbourne and Normanby were early in their attendance, as was the venerable lord Rolle. The curiosity of strangers was mortified by the absence of the duke of Wellington, lord Brougham, lord Lyndhurst and Melbourne. At a few minutes after two the quick succession of guns prepared the brilliant assemblage within the house for her majesty's approach. The procession, in its usual order, passed through the royal gallery, which was lined with the household troops, and thence, with the least fortune, though scarcely less imposing array of rank and fashion, that was unable to obtain admission to the interior, presenting a scene of great splendor. Within the house the effect upon her majesty's entrance and the whole assembly, in their various gorgeous attires, rose, was exceedingly striking. Her majesty, who was preceded by the heralds and pursuivants, the lord chancellor, the earl of Exeter, the earl of Shaftesbury with the cap of maintenance, viscount Melbourne with the sword of state, the earl marshal, and the other great officers of state, was led to the throne by his royal highness prince Albert, who then took his seat on her left hand side.

Her majesty wore a magnificent robe of white satin richly embroidered with gold, and trimmed with gold lace, over which she wore the mantle of state. A dazzling tiara, stomacher, necklace and ear-rings of brilliants completed the royal toilet. Prince Albert wore a field marshal's uniform, with the ribbon and decorations of the garter. Both her majesty and his royal highness appeared in excellent health. The speaker and the members of the house of commons having been summoned to the bar by the usher of the black rod, the royal honorable gentleman shortly afterwards appeared, attended by a considerable number of members.

The speaker then addressed her majesty as follows: Most gracious sovereign, we, your majesty's faithful commons, approach your majesty with sentiments of united devotion and loyalty. It has been our most anxious desire, in granting the supplies for the present year, to place at the disposal of your majesty the means by which the naval and military establishments of the country might be placed in a state of complete efficiency, and we entertain a strong conviction that, by thus enabling your majesty to maintain the honor of the crown and protect the just rights and interests of the people, we have adopted a course, which upon the favor of Divine Providence, will ensure both to this country and the rest of Europe a continuance of the blessings of peace. We now tender to your majesty an act to apply certain sums of money for the service of the year 1841, and to appropriate the supplies of this session of parliament, to which, in all humanity, we pray your majesty's gracious assent.

The lord chancellor then presented the speech to her majesty, who concisely and graciously estimated that the bill was in fact given to some bills. His lordship seemed amused at this correction in the form of proceeding.

The royal assent having been given, in the usual form, to the bills, the lord chancellor presented the speech, which her majesty read with her usual clear and distinct enunciation.

The Queen's speech.

"My lords and gentlemen: I have a full consideration of the present state of public affairs, I have come to the determination of proroguing parliament, with a view to its immediate dissolution."

"The paramount importance of the trade and industry of the country, and my anxiety that the exigencies of the public service should be provided for in the manner least burdensome to the community, have induced me to resort to the means which the constitution has entrusted to me, of ascertaining the sense of my people upon matters which so deeply concern their welfare."

"I entertain the hope that the progress of public business may be facilitated, and that divisions injurious to the course of steady policy, and useful legislation may be removed by the authority of a free parliament, which I shall direct to be summoned without delay."

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I thank you for the readiness with which you have voted the sums necessary for the civil and military establishments."

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In the exercise of my prerogative, I can have no other object than that of securing the rights and promoting the interests of my subjects; and I rely on the co-operation of my parliament, and the loyal zeal of my people, for support in the adoption of such measures as are necessary to maintain that high station among the nations of the world, which it has pleased Divine Providence to assign to this country."

As soon as her majesty had concluded,

The lord chancellor said: It is her majesty's royal will and pleasure that this parliament be prorogued to Tuesday, the 29th of June inst. to be then here broken, and this parliament is accordingly prorogued till Tuesday, the 29th of June.

On the 25th June the royal proclamation was published, ordering writs for the election of a new parliament.

The Queen and her ladies. The cheers with which her majesty was hailed on her return from the house of lords on Tuesday were greatly increased as she reached Whitehall, but as her majesty's carriage turned into the horse guards, loud cries were raised of "Remember the coin laws!" "Repeal the coin laws!" These cries evidently reached the royal ear, as her majesty seemed to bow assent to the demand of her loyal subjects, which drew forth renewed acclamations.

The elections for the members of the new parliament took place in several of the districts as the last of June. Both parties claim the victory, and although the parties are nearly balanced, it appears that the Tories have rather obtained the ascendancy. The Londoners claim the victory, but admit that another dissolution of parliament will, in all probability, follow at no distant period, owing to the nearly balanced state of parties in the new parliament.

The Globe writes that every individual connected with her majesty's government, whose election has come on, has, so far as they are aware, been returned, and many of them by the largest and most important constituencies. Among them are lord John Russell, for London; lord Palmerston, for Liverpool; sir John Cam Hobhouse, for Nottingham; the chancellor of the exchequer for Portsmouth; Mr. Macaulay, for Edinburgh; Mr. Labouchere, for Taunton; sir George Grey, for Devonport; Mr. Clay, for Tower Hamlets; Mr. Parker, for Shaftesbury; Mr. Vernon Smith, for Northampton; the attorney general for Worcester; the lord advocate, for Leith; captain Dean Duedas, for Greenwich; lord Listowel, for St. Albans.

It appears that lord Palmerston lost his election in Liverpool, and was run for in Tiverton. The Liverpool Mail of July 1st, gives the following as the result of their election.

The mayor has just made the following official declaration of the state of the poll at the close, which will be found to be most satisfactory, both as to the return which we had furnished. The announcement was received with enthusiastic cheering—Sutton, 5,878; Creswell, 5,792; Palmerston, 4,431; Walmsley 4,647.

Dreadful riots occurred in many places, on the evening of the election, particularly in Liverpool, where four men and one woman was shot, and serious injury was done to property.

"In addition, also, it is said, 'the hospitals are filled with the wounded, and one policeman has died of his wounds.'"

The Liverpool Mail of the 1st instant, states that the conservative members already returned are 110; the liberal members 77. The conservative gain is 20, the radical 15—leaving a majority in favor of conservatism of 14, or 23 votes on a division, in the house of commons.

Defeat of Mr. Hume. Joseph Hume has been defeated at Leeds. His will, probably, not sit in the next parliament.

The London Morning Chronicle, (liberal) of June 3d, has the following article respecting the result of the late election.

"At twelve o'clock last night the return received (reckoning the double vote for Bedford on both sides), were 160 radicals and 156 Tories. The tories have lost twenty-two seats, and gained thirty-seven; so that the reformers have hitherto maintained in all the four seats. From twenty-two boroughs, returning thirty-one members, we have received no return. What proportion of these seats may be filled by liberals, we cannot say with certainty. But with respect to thirteen of these seats, no doubt is entertained, and they may now be set down as belonging to the liberals."

Official declaration of the poll in the city of London. In consequence of the dispute respecting the correctness of the returns published by the conservative and whig committees (the utmost excitement and interest have prevailed in the city, during the whole of the morning, to learn the actual state of the facts, as they were to be developed by the official declaration of the final result of the poll, which sheriff Gibbs yesterday intimated would be made this day at two o'clock.

From an early hour the Guildhall presented an animated appearance, and the crowd kept continually increasing, manifesting the greatest impatience for the exhibition of the members. Exactly at the appointed hour, the sheriffs, with a numerous retinue, appeared upon the hustings, and immediately declared the number polled to be as follows:

For Masterman, 6,339; Wood, 6,318; Lyall, 6,200; Russell, 6,211; Althow, 6,212; Patison, 6,200; Crawford, 6,080; &c.

The sheriffs then declared the choice of the citizens of London to have fallen upon Mr. Masterman, Sir R. Wood, Mr. Lyall and Lord J. Russell, as their representatives in the commons house in the ensuing parliament.

The new members having returned thanks, the meeting was dissolved.

Thus Lord John Russell has escaped defeat by a majority of nine. How this majority may be dealt with by a committee of the house of commons remains to be seen.

The Morning Post of the 30th June has the following remarks:

Looking to what has taken place in the city of London—looking to the towns which have already chosen conservative members instead of their late ministerial representatives—looking to the probability of additional gains in the towns, and the certainty that about a dozen county seats which have been abandoned by the ministerials will be filled in the ensuing parliament by conservatives, we may fairly regard it as impossible that the present ministry should continue. It is already a moral certainty that there will be a decided majority of conservatives in the next house of commons. And the political certainty consequent upon that is, that Sir Robert Peel will be the chief minister.

Conservative loss and gain. The returns to the new parliament, (including one from Scotland—Leith), up to Friday evening, July 3d, received in London, are—

Liberals,	169
Tories,	145

Majority for the liberals.

The total amount of the university, city and borough constituency of England, is 541, of which, as above seen, 317 have been elected. It is stated that in comparative ease and gain the two parties that the Tories have a majority in this respect, against the liberals of 9 or 15 votes on a division.

Ministerial changes. Sir George Grey is to have the duchy of Lancaster, with a seat in the cabinet; succeeded as judge of the Exchequer, by Mr. Shiel, late vice-president of the board of trade.

Mr. More O'Ferrall, secretary of the admiralty, has the post of financial secretary of the treasury, vice Gordon O'Ferrall is succeeded at the admiralty by Mr. Parker, Mr. P. for Sheffield.

The hon. E. J. Stanley, joint secretary of the treasury, has been appointed postmaster general of the forces in the place of Sir Henry Parnell, who retires from parliament.

The honorable Fox Maule has been transferred to the vice presidency of the board of trade. He was succeeded by Lord Seymour, from the secretaryship of the board of control, in which post he is succeeded by Mr. C. Buller.

Lord Plunket has, at length, resigned the lord chancellorship of Ireland. Sir John Campbell, the attorney general, is to be his lordship's successor who will be elevated to the peerage.

The vacant post of governor of Bombay is not yet filled up.

The new queen's counsel. Mr. Whately and Mr. Godson, M. P. of the Oxford circle; Mr. Knowles, Mr. Baines, and the honorable Stuart Wortley, of the northern circuit; Mr. Sutton Sharpe; and Mr. Austin.

The king and queen of the Belgians and suite arrived at Buckingham palace, London, on the 23d ultimo.

Marriage of prince Albert's brother. It is stated that the present visit of the king of the Belgians to London has reference to the contemplated marriage of the brother of prince Albert with the princess Clementine, the only unmarried daughter of Louis Philippe.

Whitmore, Wells & Whitmore, bankers, of London, have failed.

Steamer lost. The Pollak steamer has been lost off the island of Elba. Only one person drowned.

The President steamer. A letter dated June 12, has been received at Paris, which says: "Captain Hammond, of the British brig Venus, which arrived here on the 7th inst., reports that he had, on his voyage from Cadiz to Newfoundland, in the middle of April last, passed a large steamer drifting on the ice, in which his most shortly after have been blocked up. The captain of the brig hoisted his number, and the steamer in answer the British flag. The brig not having been reported by the steamer, which was endeavoring to proceed homewards, capt. Hammond supposes it must have been the President. He was obliged to make a circuit of more than 100 miles, to avoid running in the ice predicament."

The markets. Matters in the English money market seem to be in more active state than we had reason to hope for by our last advices. Although a monetary shock has been given to American credit by the state of Indiana, not remitting the funds required in part, the advance upon its stock, and the 1st inst. is, however, believed on the departure of our advices, that the amount was in transitu per the Great Western. All transactions in American state stock or bank stocks, seem to be in abeyance.

Liverpool cotton market, Friday, July 3. The demand for cotton throughout the week has been pretty brisk, and not less than 29,230 bags have been sold, of which speculators have taken 3,000, and exporters 300 American. The market is not very abundantly supplied, and an advance of 3d. per lb. has been obtained for American descriptions on last week's prices. Brazil, Egyptian, East India, &c. are without any material alteration in prices. The trade have bought freely, there having been a still further improvement in the demand for yarns and goods last Tuesday at Manchester. There were forwarded into the country last month unsold 5,600 American, 150 Brazil, and 20 Surat. The import of the week amounts to 20,439 bags. To-day's demand was for 10,000 bags, and the stock was fully 5,000 bags, for which full prices have been obtained.

Sales from the 26th June to the 2d inst. inclusive: 30 Sea Island 1447½; 10 Stained do. 7, 8,000 Upat 51½; 7, 14,600 Orleans 42½; 4,760 Alabama and 24.

July 3. The sales of cotton for the week ended 25th ult. amounted to 28,780 bales, and for that ended yesterday they were 30,430 bales, of which 8,000 were Upat at 51½; 12,600 Orleans at 51½; 4,760 Alabama and 24; and 30 Sea Island at 1447½ per lb. About 3,000 bales have been taken during the week on speculation. The business to-day is estimated at fully 5,000 bales, of which 1,000 is on speculation. The receipts into this port since the 1st January, of all kinds are about 740,000; of which 610,000 are American, against 910,000 bales of this time last year of all sorts, of which 810,000 were American, and the stock at present here is estimated at 690,000 bales, against 480,000 bales on the 3d July last; the stock of American cotton is now 475,000 bales, or about 90,000 bales more than it then was, and considering the state of our manufacturing districts, and so much cotton to be sold, it holds out very little encouragement for any advance.

Liverpool corn market, July 2. Owing to the bustle occasioned by the election, business in all free articles of the corn trade appeared to be nearly suspended between Tuesday last and to-day, the prices of each remaining nominally unvaried. In the course of the week, however, we have received several valuable inquiries for wheat in bond, and several cargoes of foreign have been sold for arrival within the range of our last quotations; these, with 1,000 bbls. of Philadelphia flour, now under lock, at 28s. per bbl. comprise the extraordinary transactions now naming within the last two days.

London corn exchange, July 4. The weather is very damp and close, and there appears to be danger of too much rain.

The accounts from the country are unfavorable, as regards the wheat crop, and from near Ipswich one party writes that he never recollected the wheat plant following out worse.

From Birkshire there is an unfavorable account, and from Surrey also.

From Ireland and Scotland the reports are good.

From Denzong the accounts came of an late date as last Sunday. The weather had then turned fine and bright, after two or three week's rain which had done good. The winter sown wheat and rye looked thin, but the crop on the whole presenting a promising appearance, and potatoes were rather looking down. Here to-day we have hardly any fresh wheat at market, and what there is has sold at 1s. advance. In bonded there are some transactions at full prices.

FRANCE.

The party adverse to the peace of Europe is again beginning to be active. The war mania is again rising; and it is by no means satisfactory to know that some of Louis Philippe's ministers show a disposition to encourage it. The French marine minister, M. Guizot, Vessels are being regularly despatched to the Mediterranean. The Turkish empire is distracted. Eastern affairs unsettled; and this, coupled with the state of feeling in Paris, all dictate the utmost vigilance, and in variance with the policy of M. Guizot.

The duke de Nemours returned to Paris from Africa on Monday evening 28th ult.

The Minister promulgates the law authorizing the establishment of a new line of steam packets in the Mediterranean.

The Carlist French journals speak of changes in the French ministry as probable.

Admiral Lacaze takes the command of the Mediterranean fleet.

A number of peers approved, on Wednesday, of the treaty of commerce lately concluded between France and Holland.

M. Lefebvre de Bacoart, the charge d'affaires of France at Buenos Ayres, has written to the ministry to demand his immediate recall, new difficulties having arisen in La Plata, which could only be settled by an appeal to arms.

FRANCE.

A letter from Toulon of the 18th, has the following contents:

The Ephraïm steamer has arrived from Algiers. It brings the following intelligence, dated Algiers, June 14th: The army has again taken the field. The expedition (about 10,000 strong, including the 10th battalion of sharpshooters) left Bidah on the 10th, escorting an immense convoy destined to revictual the garrison of Medeah and Mitnah. On the 11th the troops passed the Cot de Monzie without obstacle, and on the 12th left 150,000 rations at Medeah. On the 13th the army commenced its march to Mitnah. All these particulars have been transmitted to us by the telegraph. The weather is cool and favorable to the expedition.

The Toulons of the 22d contains intelligence from Algiers of the 18th inst. the environs of which painfully demonstrate the nature of the tenure by which the French hold the country. "The environs of Algiers continued to be infested by the Arabs, and not a day passed over without a robbery or a murder being committed close to the walls of the city."

SPAIN.

Madrid letters of the 24th of June, announce that the cortes have declared vacant the office of guardian of her majesty queen Isabella II.

The young queen of Spain is reported to be in a very bad state of health. The household of the regent is entirely military.

The Courier de Bordeaux publishes the speech delivered by Espartero when elected regent of Spain, which was a very word for word with that pronounced by Napoleon in the presence of the senates, after his appointment as consul for life.

PORTUGAL.

The ministerial crisis here has been brought to a close, and a new cabinet formed. The financial affairs of Portugal are still in a very deplorable condition, though it is expected that the forthcoming foreign dividend will be paid.

RUSSIA.

The island of Candia is still in arms. France indicates some intention of counteracting this movement, and King Otto has already done so. The latest news from Bulgaria and Macedonia was of an unfavorable character. Private letters from Meia state that Mehmet Ali would not accede to the clause in the heli schrist fixing the amount of tribute at 40,000,000 piasters. He declares he will not pay more than 6,000,000.

RUSSIA.

The emperor has returned to the Hague, with his second son, the grand duke of Constantinople, who serves as a midshipman on board the Aurora frigate.

DENMARK.

The government had concluded a treaty, with Great Britain and Sweden relative to the passage of the sound. In virtue of this treaty, the duration of which is limited to ten years from the 13th June, and may be prolonged for ten years more, if agreeable to the contracting parties, the court of Copenhagen has established a new tariff of duties to be paid by merchant vessels navigating under English colors. According to this tariff, the duties on coffee and cocoa are reduced from 24 shillings (48 shillings are equal to a raw dollar, &c. 41d.) to 3 shillings per quintal on sugar, from 3 shillings to 6d.; the duties on rice continue fixed at 6 shillings per four quintals, and that on cotton goods at 1 per cent. ad valorem.

THE EAST.

According to the latest accounts from the East, the war continued to rage in Candia, and was generally favorable, though not decisively so, to the Christian insurgents.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 20th states, under date Constantinople the 24, that the pasha of Bagdad, Bosnia and others, had revolted, and intended to declare themselves independent of the central government. It was said that the pasha of Bagdad, not having succeeded in his undertaking, had sought refuge in Persia. According to accounts from Vienna of the 15th, prince Metternich would not leave that capital before the 15th of July.

CHINA, INDIA.

By the usual monthly advice from Mercellies have been received advices from China, and the principal ports of the Levant. The dates are from Bombay, May 15, from Malta, June 1.

Sir Gordon Brierley was at Calcutta, organizing reinforcements for the army in China. The reinforcements consist of 2,500 Europeans, and a small number of native troops. At Bombay similar preparations are in progress for sending troops to China, where the most unfavorable aspect prevails. The cholera was raging at Bombay, but the mortality does not appear to have been very alarming, and was confined to the natives.

The armament against China, which was to leave on the arrival of Mr W. Parker, consisted of two large frigates, and two iron steamers constructed expressly for the navigation.

The news received by this mail is not of a remarkable kind. The eyes of all are turned towards China, but nothing has been received from thence of a date more recent than that brought by the last steamer. Her majesty's brig Larne is in the harbor of Bombay, awaiting the arrival of the new admiral. At Calcutta preparations are going forward to send a reinforcement to the expeditionary force, and to send soldiers, and at Madras similar preparations are made for sending additional soldiers and miners.

The season is now very much advanced, and it is ascertained that nothing satisfactory will be done before the storms set in the Chinese seas.

The accumulation of goods outside Canton is immense, and will now, without doubt, be thrown on the market. Prices will rule very low. Patna opium is quoted at 400 to 410 Spanish dollars. Benares at 400, and Mulwah at 410.

The following is the proclamation issued by the joint imperial commissioner concerning the opening of the trade. It must be received with much qualification, for captain Elliot's demands were not as stated. There was no intimation of removing the ships of war from Canton.

"Proclamation from the joint commissioners Yang and the acting governor E. calling on the people to resume commercial intercourse. March 30.
"Yang, joint imperial commissioner, noble of the second order, &c. and E. acting governor of the two Kang, &c. hereby issue proclamation to carry on commercial intercourse as usual, and peacefully to pursue ordinary occupations.

"Whereas, upon the 15th of the present month, the English plenipotentiary officially represented that it was his desire to maintain peace, and he demanded nothing else, but only immunities permission for the trade to be carried on as usual.

"And whereas the commercial intercourse enjoyed by various countries to owing to the good pleasure of the celestial court that all should cherish tenderly men from afar.

"Therefore, the English plenipotentiary having so represented that he demands nothing else but trade only, and the merchant ships of America having, in consequence of the war, suffered detention, so that their cargoes remain unsold, and there is no prospect of returning home, and a climate cannot be made commensurable to these circumstances permitting them risks to trade, and thus displaying a compassionate regard.

"While the facts will be duly represented to the throne, it is ever best to tolerate these, which commands for the information of all. For this, then, it is proclaimed to all the tradesfolk, soldiery and people in general, for their full information, that henceforward the merchants of all nations are alike permitted to repair to Whampoa and trade, and you will hold intercourse with them, and pass to and fro, as usual; and there shall be no hindrance or obstruction made, nor any trouble created. After the English vessels of war shall be withdrawn, it will yet be more right and becoming to protect, and carefully to look to and well treat, the merchant vessels at Whampoa, and the merchants dwelling at Canton. Let every one tremblingly obey. Oppose not this special proclamation.

"Tsoukwan, Tsi Zsar, 24 month, 23rd day, 20th March, 1841. (True translation.)

"J. ROBERT MORRISON, Chinese secretary and interpreter."
"EDWARD ELMSLIE, Secretary and translator."

The Canton Register of March 20th, gives the following information:—"The more reports are that the English ships of war have removed below the city of Canton about one mile and a half; that the British flag was hoisted down in Canton on the evening of the 16th instant, the guard removed, and the flag has never since been hoisted. The further demands of the local government now are, that all the English ships of war are to leave the river, the fort and island of North Wangtung to be evacuated and surrendered to the Chinese, before any trade as usual can be recommenced. If these demands are complied with, the next that will be pressed upon her majesty's plenipotentiary will probably be, to rebuild the Bogue forts at English cost, and on the latest and most improved military principles of defence and offence. Will not his excellency's magnanimity grant such reasonable and modest demands? More troops are daily arriving in Canton, but we know nothing of Yinson's movements or intentions, if he is indeed in Canton. It was rumored on Saturday that he had annulled Yang's proclamation for renewing the trade with the English. About fifteen ships are now supposed to be at Whampoa; the treatment experienced by the English and United States vessels, under the renewed usual trade will furnish matter for remark next week or before."

MISSION TO ENGLAND. The National Intelligencer of 18th inst. says—"We are authorized to say that the president, some time ago, tendered the important trust of the mission to England to the hon. John Sergeant, the distinguished member of congress from the city of Philadelphia.

Having held the offer under consideration, Mr. Sergeant, we regret to learn, with just acknowledgment of the honor of the proposed high public employment, and his grateful respect for such a mark of confidence, felt himself obliged to decline the appointment. So far as we may gather from rumor, the reasons for this were of a private nature, such as might properly influence the head of a large family, and one who, it is probable, has participated in that diminution of income, from vested property, which the convulsions of recent times have rendered so general. Mr. Sergeant is well known to the whole country. His service in congress has already been unusually long, most useful to the country, and, as we believe, in the highest degree acceptable to his constituents. There are many eminent citizens from among whom, without doubt, a highly fit selection may be made for minister to London, but it will be no good fortune if the executive choice should fall on any one in whose integrity, ability, prudence, and American feeling, the American people would have more confidence than in those of John Sergeant of Pennsylvania."

The Cincinnati Chronicle of the 8th, evening, has the following notice of the final ceremonies connected with the interment of the remains of president HARRISON, and of the spot where they are deposited:

"THE TOMB. The steambot Raritan, which conveyed the hearse and committee yesterday, arrived at North Bend, about 3 P. M. It was intended to have the services at the grave strictly private. The zeal and excitement of the public could not, however, be repressed. Three other steamboats left the wharf at the same time, and on the ground thousands of people from the neighboring country had collected. All were anxious to see the spot where the body of their late chief was to be laid.

The spot was most peculiarly well selected. It is a sort of mound, separated from the hill by ravines, about a hundred yards back from the river, and elevated about an inch fifty or sixty feet. The river here makes a curve, and from a great distance above and below, the stranger who shall pass on the stream of the Ohio, may view in the distance the TOMB OF HARRISON.

The services at the grave were performed jointly by the Rev. Dr. WILSON and the Rev. Mr. BRADDOCK. The body was deposited in a vault, there to await the last trumpet call.

By Ohio's descending wave,
His country's vows shall bless the grave.

—And there
Imperial Honor's awful hand,
Shall point his lonely bed!

REVOLUTIONARY REMINISCENCES. The nomination of general Washington to be commander-in-chief of the American army. The Troy Whig says that there is a very prevalent error existing in this country as to the individual member of the continental congress who nominated George Washington to be commander-in-chief of the American army—the honor of that nomination having been almost universally ascribed to John Adams of Massachusetts; while it is really believed to Thomas Johnson of Maryland, who soon after signaled his patriotism by hastening from civil life with a body of Maryland troops, to join the army during its retreat through New Jersey, and who, as a just tribute to his virtues and talents, was elected the first governor of his native state.

The evidence on which this statement rests is found in the following extract from a letter written by John Adams himself to colonel Pickering, dated August 6th, 1822. After giving an account of his going to Philadelphia, in 1775, in company with Cushing, Francis Adams and Paine, "four poor pilgrims," Mr. Adams says:

"They were met at Frankfort by Dr. Rush, Mr. Milfin, Mr. Bayard and others, who desired a conference, and particularly cautioned not to flip the word 'independence.' They asked, you must not count forward with any bold measure; you must not pretend to take the lead; you know Virginia is the most populous state in the union; they are very proud of their ancient dominion, as they call it; they think they have a right to take the lead, and the southern states and middle states are too much disposed to yield it to them.

"This was plain-dealing, Mr. Pickering; and I must confess, that there appeared so much wisdom and good sense in it, that it made a deep impression on my mind, and it had an equal effect on all my colleagues. This conversation, and the principles, facts and motives suggested in it, have given a color, complexion, and character to the whole policy of the United States from that day to this. Without it, Mr. Washington would never have commanded our armies, nor Mr. Jefferson have been the author of the Declaration of Independence, nor Mr. Richard Henry Lee the mover of it, nor Mr. Chase the mover of dissolving foreign connections.

"It has had cause to repent of any part of this policy, that repentance ever has been, and ever will be, unavailing. I have forgot to say, nor had Mr. Johnson ever have been the nominator of Washington for general."

judgment whether the facts amount to a felony or not, but merely whether enough is shown to justify the detainer of the prisoner, and put him upon his trial."

"—The cases I have noticed were, in several respects, stronger for the prisoner than the case before us.—They were mostly founded on charges of a character not much less serious than murder. They were all before indictment found; some of them presented a state of things on which it was plainly impossible to convict; and last, though not least, they were mere applications for bail; a thing which, I need not say, I must ask for. He demands an absolute discharge, on grounds upon which, according to the laws of England, he would not even be entitled to bail. The law of England formed in this respect the law of New York, until our new habeas corpus act took effect."

"It becomes necessary next to inquire whether the new statute has worked any enlargement of our powers beyond what we have seen they were up to the time when it passed. The R. S. 469, 3d ed. § 40, 41, requires us to examine the facts contained in the return, and into the cause of the confinement of the prisoner; and if no legal cause be shown for it, or for its continuance, we are to discharge him.—That here is legal cause, viz: an indictment for murder, and an order of commitment, we have seen is not denied. By the 45th section, p. 478, if it appear that the party has been legally committed for any criminal offence, we are required to let him to bail, if that be the bailable. But as there have no doubt been a great number of cases where a habeas corpus has been granted, we are left under the restraint which I have noticed as existing before the statute. Not one of them is removed by it."

"Then comes section 50, p. 471, which is relied on by the prisoner's counsel. I briefly noticed this in proposing the question to be considered. But the prisoner is entitled to the benefit of it entire. The words are, that "the party brought before such court of officer, on the return of any writ of habeas corpus, may deny any of the material facts set forth in the return, or allege any fact to show either that his imprisonment or detention is unlawful, or that he is entitled to his discharge, which allegations or denials shall be on oath, and the court may inquire of either side as they shall think proper in summary way to hear such allegations and proofs as may be produced in support of such imprisonment or detention, or against the same, and to dispose of such party as the justice of the law may require." Under this section the prisoner's counsel claim the right of going behind the indictment, and proving that he is not guilty by affidavit, as he may by oral testimony before the jury. We have already shown the absurdity of such a proposition in practice, and its consequent repudiation by the English criminal courts. And we were not disposed to admit its adoption by our legislators without clear words or necessary construction."

"We think its object entirely vain without a resort to the rules of construction. Its words are satisfied by being limited to the lawfulness of the authority under which the prisoner is detained, without being extended to the force of the evidence upon which the authority was exercised, or which may be in the prisoner's power to adduce at the trial. This is necessary, is rendered still more plain by considering the evil which the statute was intended to remedy. At common law, it was doubtful whether the prisoner could question the truth of the return, or overrule it by showing extrinsic facts. The power of the authority to imprison. The statute was passed to obviate the oppression which might sometimes arise from the necessity of holding a return to be true and correct, which it was in fact, or it true, depending for its validity on the act of a magistrate or court which can be shown by proofs attainable to have been detestable of jurisdiction. Watson's case, 9 Adolph. and Ellis, 731, 3 R. 8. 794, 5, 2d ed. App. over."

"An innocent man may be, and sometimes is unnecessarily imprisoned. Yet his imprisonment is no less lawful than if he were guilty. He must await his trial before a jury. There are various cases in which the enactment, allowing proof extrinsic to the return, may have effect without supplanting its application here. It must, I apprehend, for the most part, apply to the cases where the original commitment was lawful; but in consequence of the happening of some subsequent event, the party has become entitled to his discharge, as if he had been committed till he paid a fine, which he has paid accordingly, and the return states the commitment only; so after conviction he may allege a pardon, or that the judgment under which he was imprisoned has been reversed. Now it is necessary to inquire how far we might be entitled to go, where the prisoner is in custody, on the ex parte examination and warrant of a committing magistrate."

"But it is said we have power to direct the entry of a nolle prosequi, and it is a duty to look into the merits of the case with a view to decide whether it be a proper one for the exercise of that power. This proposition is also put upon a new section of the revised statutes, which, I must clearly give notice of, viz: section 478, 3d ed. The power of the attorney general alone possessed this power, and might under such precautions as he felt it his duty to adopt, discontinue a criminal prosecution in that form at any time before verdict. The power of the attorney general to institute a nolle prosequi, Chit. Cr. law, 478, ed. before cited. It probably exists unimpaired in the attorney general to this day; and it has been by several statutes delegated to district attorneys, who now represent the attorney general in nearly every thing pertaining to indictments and other criminal proceedings local to their respective counties."

"The legislators finding the power in so many hands, and fearing its abuse, by the 3 R. S. 469, 3d ed. § 40, provided that it should not thereafter be lawful for any district attorney to enter a nolle prosequi upon any indictment, or in any other way discontinue or abandon the same without leave of the court having jurisdiction to try the offence charged. This was a wise and prudent measure, and enlarged our powers that we might arbitrarily interfere on the prisoner's affidavit and other proofs varying his innocence, or even on grounds of national policy, as where the prosecution would be likely to excite party feeling, or to excite the passions, and too in displace of the attorney general and district attorney. Conceding as it was, that before the revised statutes we had no power to give such direction, the argument seeks to draw from the statute giving ex parte review a monstrous local and absolute power to compel its entry. Even if we had such power the argument would be quite extraordinary. It demands that we should finally dispose of an indictment for murder, on the sort of evidence by which we are guided upon a motion for an additur, as default or change a venue. In any view, this question belongs primarily to the executive department of the government."

"I shall have occasion to inquire hereafter whether the 45th section should be regarded as final, or subject to this application. That will depend on the question whether facts stated on the part of the prisoner, supposing them to be admissible at all, are proper for the consideration of the jury only; or whether, by this means, the prisoner is enabled to get rid of such as to divest our criminal courts of all jurisdiction either over the subject matter or person of the prisoner. We should, as we thought at the close of the argument, have felt ourselves entirely satisfied to dispose of the case on the first question, without looking any further into the nature of the transaction out of which this indictment has arisen. But, as counsel made the question of jurisdiction their main topic, we preferred to reserve the case, and to look into it as far as possible during a very short vacation, consistently with other pressing judicial avocations."

"Want of jurisdiction has not been put on the ground that McLeod was a foreigner. An alien, in whatever manner he may have entered our territory, if he be committed a crime while here, amenable to our criminal law. Lord Mansfield, in Caubell v. Hall Cowp. 208. Vattel, B. 2, chap. 9, § 101—2. Story's Conf. L. 818, 3d ed. Nay, says Locke, though he were an Indian, and never heard of our laws, he is liable to B. 2, § 101—2."

"But it is said his case belongs exclusively in the forum of nations, by which counsel mean the diplomatic power of the United States and England, and in the event of their disagreement, the battle field, if they agreed admitted that counsel may, under the 50th section of the habeas corpus act, allege and prove a want of jurisdiction. To show this the affidavit of McLeod is produced, from which the inference is sought to be raised that the Niagara frontier was the scene of the crime, and the notorious province of Upper Canada; that the homicide was committed by McLeod, if at all, as one of a military invading expedition, set on foot by the Canadian authorities to destroy the fort Caroline; that he was a British subject; that the expedition crossed our boundary, sought the Caroline at her moorings in Schomster, and there set fire to her and burned her, and killed Durfee, one of our citizens, as it was lawful to do in time of war."

"We need not stay to examine the conclusion, viz: a want of jurisdiction, if the premises be untrue. To warrant the destruction of property or the taking of life on the ground of public war, it must be what is called lawful war, by the law of nations, a thing which we cannot deny. We cannot deny the competence of the war making power. This, on the part of the United States, is congress; on the part of England, the queen. A state of peace and the continuance of treaties must be presumed by all courts of justice till the contrary be shown; and this is a presumptio juris et de jure, until the national power of the country in which such courts sit, officially declares the contrary."

"A learned and able writer on the law of nations makes this remark, (1 Ward's Law of Nations, 194): "Although I am aware that there is a great authority for the contrary opinion yet it is upon the whole settled that no private hostilities, however great, or however just, will constitute what is called a legitimate and public state of war. So far indeed has my lord Cook carried this point, that he holds, if all the subjects of a king of England were to make war on another country in league with it but without the assent of the king, there would still be no breach of the league between the two countries." 1 Bl. Com. 207, 8. P. Again, in Blackburn v. Thompson 15 East. 81, 90, lord Ellenborough, c. j. delivering the opinion of the court of king's bench, said, "I agree with the master of the rolls in the case of the Pelican, (1 Edw. Adm. Rep. Append. D) that it belongs to the government of the country to determine in what relation of peace or war any other country stands towards it; and that it would be unsafe for courts of justice to take upon them to give that authority, to decide upon those relations. But when the crown has decided upon the relation of peace or war in which another country stands to this, there is an end of the question." 3 Camp. 66, 7, 8. C. C. 101."

"So far were the two governments of England and the United States from being in a state of war when the Caroline was destroyed, that both were struggling to avoid such a turn of the excitement thus prevailing on the subject, as they might have occasioned war. Both had long maintained the relations of national amity; and have done so ever since under an actual treaty. So far from England fitting out a war like expedition against the United States, or any public body, she utterly disavows any such object; while on our side we have inflicted legal punishment on the leaders of the expedition of which Durfee made a part, on the ground that England was then at peace with us. Whatever hostile acts she did were aimed exclusively at private individuals, and there was a war between the two parties were England on one side and her rebel subjects aided by certain citizens of our own, acting in their private capacities and contrary to the wishes of this government, on the other."

"The next question we mean to include all national wars, whether general or partial, whether publicly declared or carried on by commissions, such as letters of marque, military orders or any other authority emanating from the executive power of one country and directed against the power of another; whether the direct object relate to reprisals, the sieges of towns, the capture or destruction of private or public ships, or the persons or property of private men belonging to the adverse nation. I mean to exclude all hostility of any kind not having for its avowed object the exercise of some influence or control over the adverse nation as such. I deny that public war in this sense can be made out by an affidavit or by any other medium of proof than the declaration of war by one or both of the two nations who are parties to it."

"There are three sorts of war—public, private and mixed. Grot. B. 1, c. 2, sec. 1. commission of reprisal, limiting the action of the nation plaintiff, to particular objects and purposes against the nation defendant. It supposes a partial grievance, which can be redressed by a corresponding remedy or action, and does not authorize hostility beyond the scope of the special authority conferred. Such are several of the instances I have just now mentioned. But they are no less instances of public war. The attack on Copenhagen was mentioned on the argument of individuals, not of a nation. So indeed it was. The British admiral had a deputation from the war-making power of England to act against the war-making power of Denmark; to demand the surrender of the Danish fleet, and, on refusal, to destroy ports of private property, or take life, not as a punishment of private offenders, but to coerce the nation. Why was the attack made? Because Denmark would not surrender her navy voluntarily; and there was danger that France would take it either as a force or under collusion on the side of Denmark. Those who were in error on the side of Denmark acted not in their own right, but as agents of the nation to which they were subject.

Before the remotest analogy can be seen in this to the case at the bar, the U. States must be brought in and made defendants in their corporate capacity. It will be seen, I trust, by this time, that the instance derogates not in the least from the distinction that runs through all the writers on the international law, viz. that whether the complaint or the wrong be a public war, the authority to act must emanate from the war-making power on one side, and be intended to influence that power on the other. Action under such a power is necessarily a collision between two nations; and must be brought in, as a party, viz. "That in a public war which is made on each side by the authority of the civil power." B. 1, ch. 3, §1. At §4, he divides this sort of war into solemn and unsolomon, of which latter he gives an instance in B. 3, ch. 2, §2. N. 3, Vid. also 2 Auth. p. 507 and 548.

The distinction has been followed to this day, though the legal character of unsolomon war has since been changed. "Both," says Kutherforth, have now lawful. The only real effect of a declaration of war is, that it makes war a legitimate action, while the imperfect sorts of war, such as reprisals or acts of hostility, are partial, or are confined to particular persons, or things or places. In solomon wars all the members of one nation act against the other under a general commission, and the members of one nation are not solomon, those members of one nation who act against the other, act under particular commissions." Roth, B. 2, ch. 9, §18. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 15. Both sorts of war are lawful, because carried on under the authority of a power acting by the law of nations a right to institute them. "If any other war no belligerent rights can be acquired. All captures, all destruction of property must be illegal, and the taking of life a crime. Short of this war cannot be carried into an enemy's country, for the simple reason that there is no war to carry there, and no enemy against whom it can be exerted. The nation denouncing war must be explicit. "This makes it," says Vattel, formal, and no lawful. But nothing of this kind," says he, "is the case in an informal, illegitimate war, which is more properly called depredation. A nation attacked by enemies, without the sanction of a public war, is not under any obligation to observe towards them the rules of formal warfare. She may treat them as robbers." Vattel, B. 3, ch. 4, §98. "The law of nations," says Blackstone, "are not ranked among open enemies; but are treated like pirates and robbers."

It was accordingly conceded, in argument, that the Canadian private authorities had no inherent power to institute a public war. Vide 2 Ruth. 496-7-8. We were, however, referred to Buth. 4, ch. 3, sec. 18-19, to show that those authorities might do so on the presumption that their sovereign would approve the step; and that an approval would reflect back and render the war lawful from the beginning. On the assumption that this indirect mode of instituting war had actually been resorted to, counsel again bring themselves back to the fundamental error which led to this application. No one would deny that if the affair in question can be tortured into law between this nation and England, the United States might take possession of McLeod as a prisoner of war. In such case, there would have been no need of this motion. But admitting the rules of Butham as a guide, and that counsel might, by the aid of England, get up an ex post facto war for the benefit of McLeod, this cannot be done by an equivoque; and especially not in contradiction to the language of England herself.

Neither the private authorities nor the sovereign power of either country have, to this day, characterized the transaction as a public war, actual or constructive. They never thought of its being one or the other. Both have spoken of it as a transaction public on one side, to be sure, but both claimed to hold fast the relations of peace. Counsel seem to have taken it for granted that a nation can do no public forcible wrong without its being at war, even though it deny all action as a belligerent. At this rate every illegal order to search a ship, or to enter on disputed territory, for the recapture of national property, or the seizure of an individual, would be an eterna and work wrong to another nation or any of its subjects, would be public war, necessarily so, though the actor should deny all purpose of war.—Were such a rule once admitted, England and the United States can scarcely be supposed to have been at peace since the revolution which made them two nations. My endeavor has been to show that on the question of war or peace there is a quo animo of nations, by which we are bound.

To prevent all misunderstanding in the progress of the argument, it is proper to observe farther, that on act of jurisdiction exerted by inferior magistrates civil or military, for the arrest or punishment of individuals, is not public war of either kind. So long as the act is kept within legal compass, though its exercise be violent, where the instance is given, to suppress a riot, quell an insurrection, or repel the hostile incursions of individuals, it is, though sanctioned by a soldier in arms, only one mode of enforcing the criminal law. It is like calling out the militia as a posse comitatus, or to be more properly expressed in the execution of process. Force becomes lawful where the law is set at defiance. We see this in the frequent resort to soldiers of the regular army by the English, in cases of dangerous riots. Vid. Kutherforth, B. 2, ch. 9, sec. 9. "The magistrate has the right to use force, and to execute process," says Kutherforth, B. 2, ch. 9, sec. 9. "The magistrate in any instance, use even the force with which he is entrusted in any other manner, or for any other purpose than is warranted in his appointment, this, as it is de facto and not the act of the public, cannot be called public war."

Scarcely that all pretence of belligerent right was wanting. It is therefore, in the first view, a lawful act of magistry that the case was sought to be put by the British into the hands of the law. "Mr. Webster," I take the words of his last letter, written after the question had been deliberately considered by his government—"The grounds upon which the British government makes this demand" (on Alexander McLeod) "are the same as those upon which the transaction on account of which McLeod has been arrested, and is to be put upon his trial, was a transaction of a public character, planned and executed by persons duly empowered by her majesty's colonial authority to take any steps and do any acts which might be necessary for the defence of her majesty's territories and for the protection of her majesty's subjects; and that consequently, those subjects of her majesty who engaged in that transaction were performing an act of public duty, for which they cannot be made personally and individually answerable to the laws and tribunals of any foreign country." In the same letter he restates the opinion of his government that "it was a justifiable employment of force for the purpose of defending the British possessions in Canada against the invasion of a band of British rebels and American pirates."

It is this view of the transaction can be sustained, it was lawful ad idcirco. It required no royal recognition to render it national. It came within the scope of the law, and excluded jurisdiction to which it is entitled with all other offenses. Whether they had power, without pretence of being engaged in a war with the United States, or could derive power from England, to fit out an expedition, cross the line, seize or destroy the property of any persons or any cities in this country, and whether any one acting under such an assumption of power can be protected, is quite a different question.

On decisive text would be furnished by admitting the Duke had committed a crime against England, for which he was liable to arrest and trial in Canada. None would pretend that any warrant from the English nation could be used to protect one of her officers from an action of false imprisonment, or to prevent the arrest of a man on the other side the line. No one would pretend that a military order and the addition of the queen's soldiers and sailors would, in such case, strengthen a plea of justification; nor would the subsequent approval of the nation. This would have no greater effect than the original authority; accordingly it was not pretended on the argument that England had any right whatever to send and arrest Duffie as a fugitive from justice. The pretence that she had any such right would have been too absurd to bear the name of argument. Nor is it pretended that her magistrates, civil or military, had any power within the territory to seize and bind him over to keep the peace toward England or her subjects. "We cannot," says Vattel, B. 2, ch. 7, §93, "enter the territory of a nation in pursuit of a criminal, and take him from thence. This is what is called a hostis without right; and there is nothing so generally acknowledged as an injury that ought to be repelled by every state that would not suffer itself to be oppressed." The rule is too familiar, even as between the states of this confederacy, to require that it should be insisted on at large.

But the civil war which England was prosecuting against various individuals, was insisted on as a ground of protection; but I am free to admit that the strongest possible color for the extraordinary right claimed, is to be derived from making the States to stand in the attitude of a neutral nation with respect to two parties engaged in actual war; England on one side, and Van Rensselaer, Duffie and their associated assassins on the other. This is what is called a hostis without right. "That which is made on one side by public authority, and on the other by mere private persons." B. 1, ch. 3, §1. Kutherforth retains the same distinction under the same name, in characterizing a contest between a sovereign state and its external enemies coming in the form of pirates or robbers; assassins, he says, can act together occasionally; and are not united into civil society. Roth, B. 2, ch. 9, §9.

The several instances of England's meddling with the American people, and her conduct toward Wake and Lord Herrie, mentioned in 1 Hal. P. C. 164, the former of which is also noticed in Calvin's case, 7 Co. Rep. 11-12, are instances of such a war, the books say that in England, such offenders must be tried by martial law, or a court which is still heretofore considered. Let Duffie, then, be regarded as England's enemy, who has, with Wells the boat owner, and his boat, taken shelter in the neutral territory of the United States. Had England any right to follow him there? None; any such attempt would be a violation of the law of nations. He was an enemy pursued and flying for shelter across the line. 1 Kent's Com. 119-20. Independently of fresh pursuit, no writer on the laws of nations ever ventured the assertion that one of two belligerents can lawfully do any hostile act against another upon neutral ground.

If it be not a plain deduction from common sense, yet, on principles in which publicists agree, all rightful power to harm the person or property of any one dropped from the hands of McLeod and his associates the moment they entered a country with which their sovereign was at peace. No exception can be made consistently with national safety.—Make it in favor of the subordinate civil authorities of a neighboring state, and your territory is open to its constables, in favor of their military, and you let in soldiers, in favor of its sovereign, and you are a slave. Allow him to talk of the acts and machinations of our citizens and send over his soldiers on the principle of protection, to take the property of our citizens, and to send over his troops, and you give up to the midnight assault of exasperated strangers the dwelling and life of every inhabitant on the frontier when they may suspect of a disposition to aid their enemies. Are we assailed by the treaty of 1783, had England, in time of peace, and with more right to attack an enemy at Schlosser, than would the French have at London in time of peace with England.

"The full domain," says Vattel, "is necessarily a preclusive and exclusive right. The sovereignty of a nation is full and absolute; since there exists no authority upon earth by which it can be limited; it therefore excludes all right on the part of foreigners." B. 2, ch. 7, § 79. The same writer defines the full domain as "the right that dominates." "The sovereignty united to the domain, establishes the jurisdiction of the nation in her territories. It is her province to exercise justice in all the places under her jurisdiction; to take cognizance of the crimes committed, and to direct the trial and arrest in the domain." B. 2, ch. 7, § 84. "It is unlawful," says the same writer, "to attack an army in a neutral country, or to commit in it any other act of hostility." "A mere claim of territory," says de Wm. Scott, a British judge of admiralty, "is universally acknowledged to be a claim of sovereignty, and every other consideration." In the Vrow, Anna Catharina, 5 Rob. Adm. Rep. 20-1. And he re-till they should cross the line of that country where parliament have jurisdiction. Beyond I need not say it must be considered as waste paper. Even a subsequent statute ratifying and approving the original authority could add nothing to the protection proffered by the first. It would be but the junction of two nullities. So says Mr. Locke [on Gov. B. 2, ch. 19, sect. 228] of a king even in his own dominions: "In whatsoever he has no authority, there he is no king, and may be resisted; for whenever the authority ceases, the king ceases; and the law, which is the other part of the authority, I shall not cite books to show that the queen of England has no authority in this state in time of peace."

I will suppose a stronger case; that England being at war with France, should, by statute or by order of the queen, authorize her soldiers to enter our territory and make war upon such French residents as might be plotting any mischief against her. Could one of her soldiers indicted for murder of a French citizen plead such a statute or order in excuse, he could not so successfully answer and answer in our land, I need not inquire whether or not some measure of protection be due to Dufferin our fellow citizen.

"The laws of no nation," says Mr. Justice Story, "can justly extend beyond its own territory except so far as regards its own citizens. They can have no force to control the sovereignty or rights of any other nation within its own jurisdiction. It would be monstrous to suppose that our revenue officers are authorized to enter into foreign lands and territories for the purpose of seizing vessels which had defended against our laws." The Apollon, 9 Wheat. Rep. 362, 371. He has examined the question at large in his book on the conflict of laws, ch. 3, § 17 to 22, p. 19 of 2d ed. The result is that no nation has authority to respect the laws or executive acts of any foreign government intended to control or protect its citizens while in foreign or permanently out of its own country, until it first declare war. Its citizens are then subject to the laws of war. Till that comes they are absolutely bound by the laws of peace.

While this prevails, a foreign executive declaration saying—"My subject has offended against your criminal laws. I avenge his act. Punish me but impute nothing to him," is not binding, well as that a nation and a company of soldiers to control debts here, and forbid them to be sued, saying, "the debt was on my account, discharge my men, and charge it over against me." Indeed it was urged on the argument that the letter of Mr. Fox had taken away the remedy of Wells the boat owner, by an action of trespass against McLeod for burning the boat. This action having, it seems, been settled, counsel resorted to it as an illustrative case. Another action brought against him for shooting a horse on the same occasion, it was said, is also defeated by the same principle.

Counsel spoke as if Schiesser had undergone a sack, and its booty had become matter of belligerent right in the soldiery. Surely, the imaginations of counsel must have been heated. It seems necessary to remind them again and again, even in affirmance of their own admission, that we are willing to administer the laws of a country which was at peace with England when she sent in her soldiery. If they mean that the approval and aid from Mr. Fox's letter should, under the law of peace, have the sweeping effect which is claimed for it, they are bound to show that the royal mandate implies, by importation. The queen has no power at home to take away or suspend, for a moment, the rights of any of her own citizens. She could not command to discharge any man without trial who should be suspected of having murdered her meaneul subject, be deemed a venial error.

It is justly a source of the Briton's pride that the law by which his life and property are protected cannot be suspended even by his own monarch; that the sword of justice is helden by her own independent ministers, as a defence for those who do well; but constantly threatening, and ready to descend upon the violator of the law, as a scourge, as the instrument of a municipal law which knows not of any distinction between the throne and the cottage; a law constantly struggling, in theory at least, to attain a perfection that shall bring all on earth to do justice; the greatest blessing of the people, and the least as not unworthy of its care. That case is our own.

Much was said on the argument about the extreme hardship of treating soldiers as criminals, who, it was insisted, are to be judged by the laws of war. The law is the same in respect to the soldier as it is with regard to any other agent who is bound to obey the process or command of his superior. A sheriff is obliged to execute a man who is regularly sentenced to capital execution in this state. But should he execute a man in Canada under such sentence, he would be a murderer. A soldier in time of war between us and England might be compelled, by an order from our government, to enter Canada and fight against and kill her soldiers.

But should congress pass a statute compelling him to do so on any imaginable exigency, or under any penalty, in time of peace, if he should obey and kill a man, he would be guilty of murder. The mistake is in supposing that a sovereign can compel a man to go into a neighboring country, or either in peace or war, to do a deed of infamy. This is exemplified in the case of spies. A sovereign may solicit and bribe, but he cannot command. A thousand commands would not save the neck of a spy should he be caught in the camp of the enemy. Vattel, B. 7, ch. 10, § 118. It is a mistake to suppose that a soldier is bound to do any act contrary to the law of nature, at the bidding of his prince.—Vattel, B. 1, ch. 4, § 53-54, id. B. 3, ch. 2, § 16.—Grot. B. 2, ch. 26, § 3, n. 2 and 3. Puff. B. 8, ch. 1, § 6 and 7.

But if there were, he must endure the evil of living under a sovereign, who will issue such commands. It does not follow that neighboring countries must submit to be infested with incendiaries and assassins. Nations are not obliged to receive into their own country, for being desirous to go through life with bloodless hands and a quiet conscience.—The Parisians thought themselves bound to obey Charles IX, when he ordered them to massacre the Huguenots. Suppose they had obeyed, it would be similar order to massacre the Huguenots in England. Such an order had been deemed a valid plea on one of them being arraigned in the queen's bench! It might have been pleaded to an accusation of murder in France—it would have been good against the criminal and his own sovereign; but hardly, I suspect, have been deemed so by Queen Elizabeth's judges. The simple reason would have been that Charles IX, had no jurisdiction in England.

It might have threatened the government and declared war, if such a meritorious servant, a defender of the church should not be liberated by the judges. But there is no legal principle on which the decrees of foreign courts or the legislation of foreign parliaments could be obeyed by judges of jurisdiction. Charles might have ordered his minister to call the massacre a public act, planned and executed by himself, his having authority to defend and protect his established church, and demanded reparation from him. All this might be added in reply to the plea. Neither Elizabeth herself, nor any of the Tudors, arbitrary as the government of England was, would have had power directly to take away the jurisdiction of the judges. Coke, who is reputed in his book to have baffled the sceptre within its own territorial jurisdiction, says:—

It should, in justice, be remarked, that one, the governor of Bayonne, and many of his companions in arms, refused to co-operate in the massacre at home, and never were punished for disobedience. He replied to the king, that he had punished his garrison and found many brave soldiers among them, but not a single executioner. Suppose a prince should command a soldier to commit adultery, incest, or perjury; the prince goes beyond his constitutional power, and has no more right to exact obedience than a corporal who should summarily issue his warrant for the execution of a soldier. Vid. Buri. L. of nature, vol. 1, pt. 2, ch. 11, § 5.

Every political and civil power has its legal limits. Every prince may indeed take the life of his own subjects, for disobeying the most arbitrary commands; but even his benefits cannot impart protection to the merciless slave as against a foreign government. Public war itself has its jurisdictional limits. It is, in the pursuit after it, fighting enemies who have not yet entered the line of our peace. Beside the limit which territory thus imposes, there are also, even in general war, other jurisdictional restraints at these are in courts of justice.

An order emanating from one of the hostile sovereigns will not justify to the other, any kind of perfidy. The case of spies has been already mentioned. An emissary sent into a camp with orders to corrupt the adverse general, or bribe the soldiery, would stand justified to his immediate sovereign. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 10, § 180; though even he could not legally punish a refusal. In respect to the enemy, orders would be an obvious excess of jurisdiction.

The emissaries sent by Sir Henry Clinton, in 1781, to corrupt the soldiery of the Pennsylvania line, falling into the hands of the Americans, were condemned and foundly executed. 4 Marsh. Life of Wash. 366, 1st ed. Entering the adverse camp to receive the treacherous proposition of the general is an offence much more venial than is even called a crime in every sense as between the sovereign and employed. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 10, § 181.—Yet in the case of major André, an order to do so was, as between the two hostile countries, held to be an excess of jurisdiction.

These cases are much stronger than any which can be supposed between nations at peace. In time of war such perfidy is expected. In time of peace, every citizen, while within his own territory, has a double right to suppose himself secure; the legal inviolability of that territory, and the solemn pledge of the foreign sovereignty.

The distinction that is set valid as to one may be void as to another is entirely fallacious. A man who orders another to commit a trespass, or approves of a trespass already committed for his benefit, may be bound to protect his servant, while it would take nothing from the validity of the servant to the party injured. As to him, it could scarcely have the effect of adding another defendant, who might be made jointly or severally liable with the actual wrong doer. A case in point is mentioned by Vattel, B. 3, ch. 5, § 118. It is a case in which his recruiting officer had made enlistments in the dominion of another in time of peace between them, the officer shall be hanged, notwithstanding the order, and war may also be declared against the officer of the sovereign. Vid. a like instance id. B. 1, ch. 6, § 75.

What if the almost legal effect of a foreign sovereign, approving of the crime his subject committed in a neighboring territory? The approval from a neighboring territory in part seen, it takes nothing from the criminality of the principal offender. The moral obligation his nation may be under to save him harmless, this can be absolutely done only on the condition that he conform himself within his territory. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 6, § 74. Then, by relating to such satisfaction in his foreign or to deliver him up, on demand from the injured country, or by approving the offence, the nation, says Vattel, becomes an accomplice.—Id. § 75.

Blackstone says, an accomplice or abettor [4 Comm.]—and we may add, will more nearly in the language of the English law, an accessory after the fact—B. 2, ch. 2, § 12. No book appears that such an act merges the original offence, or renders it imputable to the nation alone. The only exception live in the case of a crime committed by an accessory, rather than because he is guiltless, but by reason of the necessity that he should be privileged, and the extra territorial character which the law of nations has, therefore, attached to his person.

Hence, say the books, he cannot sue against his nation, nor can his nation sue him, because he, which will make itself a party in his crime, if it refuse either to punish him by its authority or deliver him up to be punished by its offended nation. Ruth. B. 2, ch. 9, § 20. Independently of this exception, however, Rutherford insists, with entire accuracy, that as far as we concur in what another man does, so far the act is our own; and the effects of it are chargeable upon us as well as upon him." Ruth. B. 1, ch. 17, § 6.

A nation is but a moral entity; and in the nature of things can no more wipe out the offence of another by adopting it, than could a natural person. And the learned writer just cited accordingly treats both cases as standing on the same principle. B. 2, ch. 9, § 13. "Nothing is more usual," says Puffendorf, "than that every particular accomplice in a crime be made to suffer all that the law inflicts." B. 3, ch. 1, § 5. Vattel says of such a case, B. 2, ch. 6, § 76:—If the offended state has the offender in her power she may without scruple punish him.

Again, if he have escaped and returned to his own country, she may apply for justice to his sovereignty, who ought, under some circumstances, to deliver him up.—Id. § 76. Again, he says "we may take satisfaction for the offence here, when it meets with the delinquent in her own territories." B. 4, ch. 4, § 32. I before cited two instances in which positive orders by his sovereign to commit a crime are distinctly held to render both the nation and the individual accomplices. Vattel, B. 3, ch. 2, § 15, id. B. 4, ch. 6, § 73, vid. also 1 Buri. pt. 2, ch. 11, § 10.

Was it ever suggested by any one before the case of McLeod arose, that the approval by a monarch should confer jurisdiction on the foreigner, or as mitigate the criminal offence?—say, that the coalition of great power with great crime does not render it more dangerous, and therefore more worthy of punishment under every law by which the perpetrator can be reached?

Could approbation and avowal have saved the unhappy Mary Queen of Scots, where would have been the civil jurisdiction of Elizabeth's commissioners? The very charge of an attempt by Mary to dethrone and assassinate the British queen implied the approbation and active concurrence of one crowned head at least. Could the criminal have been saved by any such consideration, the enterprise might truly have been avowed as one which had been planned by the leading government of Catholic Europe.

The pope, then, having at least some pretensions to jurisdiction even in England, had openly approved it under his seal. The Spanish ambassador at Paris was a party relied upon to follow up the execution of the sentence. Was it, then, the son of the accused, have hesitated to join in the avowal could he have thus been instrumental in saving the life of his mother? Yet the principle was not thought of in the whole course of that extraordinary trial.

Mary openly avowed her general treason as a measure of defence and protection to herself, though she denied all participation in the plot to assassinate Elizabeth. Yet the only ground taken was, the technical one (not the legal, because technical) that the accused was personally privileged as a monarch, and could not be tried under the English law, which required a jury composed of her peers. It was added that she came into the kingdom under the laws of nations, and had enjoyed protection from the English law, having been continually kept as a prisoner. Vid. the case stated and examined in the right of international law, 2 Ward's L. of nations, 264.

No one pretends that her approbation, or that of a thousand monarchs could have reflected any degree of exemption from judicial cognizance, under the alien servants in her employment. Such a principle would have filled England with an army, in place of peace, during the reign of the dignity of monarchs who at that day, have led them to avow any system of pernicious espionage which could have served the purposes of the pope by executing his bull of excommunication against Elizabeth.

Canada again being disturbed, and our citizens aiding the revolt by hosts, provisions or money, the purposes of England would certainly require such conduct to be put down at all events. Adopt the principle that she may by avowal, protect her soldiers who aid upon our citizens at England, from all punishment at the common law; and before you get even a reconnaissance from Washington, your whole frontier might be made a tabula rasa. No—England can lawfully send a single soldier for hostile purposes, she must assume the responsibility of public war.

Her own interests demanding the application of the rule, she perfectly understands its force. What regard have her courts ever paid to the voice of public authority on this side the line, when it sought to cover even territory to which the United States denies her title? The mere act of taking a census in the disputed territory under the authority of Maine, was severely punished by the English auxiliary magistrates. Had a post of soldiers or a company of military bearing muskets been sent into the censor, in what book or in what usage could she have found that this would divert her courts of jurisdiction, and put the cabinet of St. James to a remedy by remonstrance or war? Had the posse been arrested by her sheriff, and in mere defence had killed him, and this nation had, after some two or three years avowed the case, would she have thought of proceeding that in the meantime, all power of her courts over the homicides had been suspended, or finally withdrawn?

But it is said of the case at bar, here is more than a mere approval by the adverse government; that an explanation has been demanded by the secretary of state, and the British ambassador has assisted on McLeod's release, and counsel claim for the joint diplomacy of the United States and England some such effect upon the power of this court as a senior from as would have upon the county court of general sessions. It was spoken of as incompatible with a judicial proceeding against McLeod in this state; as a suit actually pending between the two nations, where in the action of the general government comes in collision with and supersedes our own.

To such an objection the answer is quite obvious. Diplomacy is not a judicial, but executive function, and the objection would come with the same force whether it were urged against proceeding in a court of this state or the United States. Whether an actual execution of the treaty making power, by the president and senate, or any power delegated to congress by the federal constitution, could work the consequences contended for, we are not called upon to inquire; whether the case is one of a nation—supposing the case to belong to the national court—or the executive of this state, might not punish the prisoner, or direct a nolle prosequi to be entered, are considerations with which we have nothing to do.

The executive power is a constitutional department in this, as in every well organized government, entirely distinct from the judicial. And that would be so, were the national government bled out, and the state of New York left to take its place as an independent nation.

Not only are our constitutions entirely explicit in leaving the trial of crimes exclusively in the hands of the judiciary; but neither in the case of things, nor in some policy, is it confided to the executive power. That can never act upon the individual offender; but only by requisition on the foreign government; and in the instance before us, it has no power even to inquire whether it is the state of New York, or the federal government, that has the right to try the criminal laws of this state. It has charge of the question in its national aspect only. It must rely on accidental information, and soay place the whole question on diplomatic considerations. These may be thought entirely outside of the fact or the law, as it stands between this state and the accused. The whole may turn on questions of national honor, national strength, the comparative value of national intercourse, or even a point of etiquette.

It is not, however, in the case of every accusation which has been drawn in question by the executive power of two nations, can be adjusted by negotiation or war only. The individual secured must go free, no matter to what extent his case is prejudicial to the confidence of the nation. No matter how criminal he may have been, if his country, though acting on false representations of the case, may have been led to approve of the transaction and negotiate concerning it, the demands of national justice are at once satisfied.

Under circumstances the executive power might, in the exercise of its discretion, be bound to disregard a venial offence as no breach of treaty, which the judiciary would be obliged to punish as a breach of treaty principle. Suppose some of our citizens to attack the British power in Canada, and the queen's soldiers to follow the heat of repelling them by crossing the line and arresting the offenders, doing no damage to any one not actually engaged in the crime, and the queen's soldiers to be injured in law for hostile purposes, the arrest on this side would be a technical false imprisonment, for which we should be bound to convict the soldiers, if arrested here; while the executive power might overlook the technical error, and acquit on the ground of violation of national territory. Vattel, B. 4, ch. 4, § 13.

Further now to notice particularly some of the legal passages and cases which were referred to by the prisoner's counsel in support of an innocent plea, not for the reason that I have omitted to examine them, but because I consider them inapplicable under the views I have felt it my duty to take of the prisoner's case. They were principally of three classes: First, passages from books on the law of nations as to what is public war and the protection due to soldiers while engaged in the prosecution of such a war by their sovereign against a public enemy; secondly, the general obligations of obedience as between him and his sovereign, whether in peace or war; and thirdly, cases from our own books relative to the conflicting powers of the general and state governments. The case of Elphinstone v. Bederechund, 1 Knapp's rep. 816, related to the first class, and was a case in which the crown, during an acknowledged public war between England and one of the petty sovereignties of India.

In considering the question of jurisdiction, I have also forgotten to notice that branch of the affidavit which is up an affidavit. McLeod's counsel properly omitted to insist on it as all it attempted the claim of privilege. Indeed, he said the clause was put in merely by way of protestation. If it was inserted with the intention of having it taken into consideration, it was a mere protestation, and all pretence for any objection to our jurisdiction. His surrender was demanded upon the hypothesis that he was acting under public authority. If, in truth, he was not, or was not acting at all, he enjoyed, according to his own concession, no greater privilege than any other man, and his essential circumstance relied on as going to the question of jurisdiction, turns out to be fictitious; and the argument must be that we have no power to try the question of alibi. On that and every other lawful ground of defence he will be heard by counsel on his trial.

It is proper to add, that if the matters urged in argument could have any legal effect in favor of the prisoner, I should feel entirely clear that they would be a matter available before the jury only, and that according to the settled rules of proceeding on habeas corpus, we should have no power even to consider them as a ground for discharging the prisoner. I took occasion to show in the outset that in no view can the evidence in the prosecution of the defence be here examined independently of the question of jurisdiction, and I entertain no doubt that whenever an indictment for murder conspired within our territory is found, and the accused arrested, these circumstances give complete jurisdiction.

I know it is said by the English books, that even in a case of mixed war, viz: a hostile invasion of England by private persons, the common law courts have not jurisdiction. It was held in Perkin Warbeck's case. He was punished with death by sentence of the countess and marshal, who it is said in Calvin's case, 7 Co. Rep. 11-12 had exclusive jurisdiction. Vattel, B. 1, § 13. But that rests on a distribution of judicial power entirely unknown to this state or this nation. The court of the countess and the marshal seems to have had an ancient right not very well defined by the common law, of trying all military offences, as appears by the Stat. R. 2, ch. 2, (v. 2) Pick. St. at Large, p. 310, which was passed to settle conflicting claims between that and the ordinary courts, vid. also 3 Inst. 48. The whole is obviously inapplicable to this country, and is pretty much forgotten in England. It never can have been held in England or any other country, that where a common law court is proceeding on indictment for a common law offence against one arrested and brought before it, it is bound to suspend its action, that the officer impaired persons should be arrested in a public or mixed war, shall have power to try, whether the prisoner be guilty or not of the charge contained in the indictment.

All homicide, whether malicious, and, therefore, murder under the contrary appears upon evidence. "The matter of fact," says Foster, "viz: whether the facts alleged, by way of justification, excuse or alleviation, are true, is the proper and only province of the jury." Lawful homicide, by authority of fact, (will recognize it, seems by the law of nature under the name of private war, Grat. B. 1, ch. 3, § 2, is one passage. Foster 273. That he acted in right of a nation, or under public authority, is no more than matter of justification, it is like the case mentioned in Foster 268; the public execution of malefactors; and the jury must judge whether the authority may not have been exceeded. But more, when either public or mixed war is alleged in mitigation, either allegation may be fictitious; and it shall be for the jury to decide, whether it is true, whether it existed or not. The reason is plain, says Lord Hale; for the war may be begun by the foreign prince only, where it is public; and he supposes it still plainer where the war is between the king and an invading alien, as in the case of the king and the king is at peace. 1 Hal. p. 6, 163. The same writer puts the case of plunder or robbery by an enemy, trampis belli, which would not in general be burglary. Yet he admits it might be otherwise if the act were not done in the regular prosecution of the war, id. 565.

Suppose a prisoner of war to creep and that on his way home, and before he crosses the line, he should set fire to a farm house in the night and kill the inmates—there is a doubt that he might properly be convicted either of arson or murder. When a grand jury have charged that a man has committed murder in this state, I can imagine no case, whether the charge relate to the time of open public war or peace, in which he can be acquitted upon his trial. If he were now that he was a truth and a soldier in time of public war, the jury would acquit him. The judge will direct them to obey the law of nations, which is undoubtedly a part of the common law. So if the charge were acting in defence against an individual invader of his country. But above all things it is important in the latter case for the jury to inquire whether his allegation of defence be not false or colorable.

They cannot assume as an act of defence the wilful pursuit of a criminal, much less that dictated by sovereign authority, into a country at peace with the sovereign of the accused, seeking out that enemy and taking his life. Such a deed can be nothing but an act of vengeance. It can be nothing but a violation of territorial rights, and a violation of the sacred faith of treaties and the law of nations. The government of the accused may approve, diplomacy may glory, but a jury can only inquire whether he was a party to the deed, or to any act of illegal violence against the person or property of his country. If he is, if satisfied that he was not, as sincerely here they may be, upon the evidence in the case before us, they will then have the pleasant duty to perform of pronouncing him not guilty. But whatever may be the result, it is the duty of the jury to decide that the prisoner, though a foreigner, will have no just cause to complain that he has suffered wrong at the hands of an American jury.

As our hands the prisoner had a right to require an answer upon the facts presented by his papers, whether in law be can properly be held to a trial. We have had no choice but to examine and pronounce upon the legal character of those facts, in order to satisfy ourselves of the bearing they might have on the novel and important questions submitted. That examination has led to the conclusion that we have no power to discharge the prisoner.

He must, therefore, be remanded, to take his trial in the ordinary forms of law.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

July 15. Mr. Wright presented the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of New York, held in the Park, containing certain resolutions passed in relation to American citizens held in captivity in Van Dieman's Land. The interference of government is solicited in their behalf. Mr. W. moved that the document be laid on the table and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. Tulandage presented a memorial of citizens of New York city, and one of citizens of Richland, Oswego county, New York, for a bankruptcy law; which were laid on the table.

The resolution of Mr. Buchanan was taken up, calling on the president for a list of removals of public officers since 4th March, 1841, with the amendment offered by Mr. Mangum, calling, also, for a list of removals and appointments from 4th March, 1829, to 4th March, 1841.

The amendment was adopted; and Mr. Benton intimating a desire to speak on the subject, at his request the resolution was laid over.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, said he would be very glad of senators would consent generally and unanimously to take up the subject from the house, at the necessity of the treasury were such as to require speedy action on this subject.

Mr. Calhoun hoped that the senator from Kentucky would not press this. They had been engaged for some time on another subject, and he hoped to dispose of it before they were taken up.

After some further remarks from Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, King, Benton and Linn, a motion was made to go into executive business. On this a debate arose as to a point of order under the new rule, which occupied some ten or fifteen minutes, Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, King and Allen participating.

The chair decided the motion to go into executive business to be in order.

Mr. Calhoun took an appeal from the decision, but withdrew it at the suggestion of friends behind him.

Mr. Calhoun asked where was the necessity of going into executive business then? Could they not go on with the business before the senate for some two or three hours, and not go into executive session at the close of the day?

Mr. Berrien did not think it a proper subject to discuss. He did not feel himself at liberty to state reasons.

Mr. Calhoun would ask if the reasons were very urgent?

Mr. Berrien could only say such was his impression.

The senate then went into executive session; and, after remaining therein for a considerable time, adjourned.

July 16. Memorials from citizens of New York and the state of Maine were presented in favor of a bankruptcy law.

Also, resolutions remonstrating against the extension of the port of New Orleans.

The resolution relative to removals from office was laid over, at the request of Mr. Benton, till tomorrow.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Woodbury some time since, calling on the treasury department for information in relation to advances made to disbursing officers, &c. since 3d of March last, was taken up, and after being so amended by Mr. Evans as to require it to be stated on what authority they were made, the resolution was adopted.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Benton some days since, calling on the treasury department for the removal of certain officers, and specifying those officers by name, was taken up.

Mr. Benton said the resolution had been submitted in consequence of a remark made by the senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Mangum), that if the information was asked for, it would be given. He (Mr. B.) did not hold that the president was bound to answer it. It was submitted solely on the ground of what had fallen from the senator from North Carolina.

Mr. Mangum was glad of an opportunity of correcting an error into which the senator from Michigan had no doubt unintentionally fallen. What he (Mr. M.) did say, on another occasion, when the resolution of the senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Buchanan) was first introduced, was that the information, when given, he had no doubt would be such as would enable the administration to stand justified before the country.

Mr. Benton said the answer was conclusive; he should not press the resolution.

Mr. Clay asked the indulgence of the senate to take up the loan bill. He felt persuaded that gentlemen on the other side had no disposition to throw impediments or embarrassments in the way of the treasury; and, after what he had stated yesterday in relation to its condition, he felt convinced they would see the necessity of some prompt action on it.

The necessity of immediate action on the bill was further urged by Messrs. Clay and Huntington, and opposed by Messrs. Calhoun, Allen and Wright; when Mr. Clay said he must call the yeas and nays.

The debate was continued by Messrs. King, Clay, Calhoun, Benton, Walker, Allen, Bates, Woodbury and others. The bill was taken up, the demand for the yeas and nays being waived.

Mr. Wright then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following proviso:

"That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize any further or greater amount of loans than shall appear to the president of the United States to be necessary to defray the current expenses of the government, and to redeem, as they shall be required, the treasury notes which have been issued, and are to be issued, under the authority of existing laws, after the application of the money in the treasury, and all the accruing revenue from lands, and all other sources, to this object; and that shall any portion of such money or revenue, or any of said loans be made under the authority granted in this act, be applied to the redemption of treasury notes outstanding, and not due and payable according to the terms of such notes; nor any portion of accruing revenue, from whatever source, or any of said loans be made under the authority granted in this act, be applied to the redemption of treasury notes due and payable, when the consequences of other appropriations might be an increase of public debt to be contracted under this act."

Mr. Clay then moved to amend the amendment by striking out the following clause:

"Nor shall any portion of such money or revenue, or any of said loans be made under the authority granted in this act, be applied to the redemption of treasury notes outstanding and not due and payable according to the terms of such notes."

On this motion a long and animated debate arose, in which Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Wright, Benton, Buchanan and others participated.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and carried, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Forster, Fremont, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tulandage, White, Woodbridge—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Folsom, King, Linn, McRoberts, Moore, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Wood—21.

On the question of the adoption of the amendment, as modified, a very spirited debate again arose, in which Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Clay, Sevier, Preston, King, Linn, Allen and others participated.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Folsom, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Moore, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Forster, Fremont, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tulandage, White, Woodbridge—26.

So the amendment was lost.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the senate then adjourned.

July 17. Mr. Calhoun presented certain resolutions passed at a public meeting in Buckingham county, Virginia, which were read, and after some remarks from Messrs. Calhoun and Clay, of Ky., the bill was laid on the table.

The loan bill came up as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. Allen moved to amend the first section of the bill to the effect that after having paid the public expenses the money obtained by the loan should be used for the defenses of the country and for no other purpose. On this amendment Mr. Allen spoke at some length, contending that the object of the loan was to enable the administration to dispense with the revenue arising from the land to aid British bankers and stock jobbers.

Mr. Calhoun went on to go as far as any man in the system of naval defense, but then the expenditure must be properly administered, and under wise and appropriate heads. The system of warfare had changed, and it would require that it should keep pace with the improvements.

Mr. Wall said if the amendment prevailed he should regard it as a pledge that the money would be so applied, and then he would vote for the whole bill.

The amendment was further debated by Messrs. Calhoun, Huntington and others.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 19, nays 24.

Mr. Woodbury then moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "twelve millions," and inserting "six millions," so that the government should not be empowered to borrow on its credit a sum exceeding that amount.

Mr. W. sustained this amendment on the ground that no more money was actually wanted for the uses of the treasury; that even the six millions would allow of a large surplus for contingencies.

Mr. Evans replied at length, maintaining that in the present state of the treasury, the revenue declining almost daily, every dollar of that money would be needed.

The debate was further kept up by Messrs. Calhoun, Woodbury, Evans and Young.

When the question on the adoption of the amendment was taken and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 16, nays 26.

Mr. King then moved to strike out "twelve millions" and insert "nine" contending that the money was not wanted, and, therefore, should not be borrowed for the mere purpose of borrowing. On the question he asked the yeas and nays, and the question being taken it was decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 22, nays 26.

Mr. Benton then moved to amend the bill by adding to the last section:

"And that the sum of two millions of dollars, and part of the amount of the loan, be intended for a reserve fund to remain in the treasury to meet contingencies, and shall not be borrowed except during the recess of congress it shall become necessary to borrow the same or some part thereof to meet the appropriation made by congress, and for which money on hand and accruing may be deemed insufficient."

Mr. B. gave his reasons for offering the amendment.

Mr. Clay replied with earnestness, contending that it had been shown, demonstrably shown, that not only would every dollar he wanted, but that more might be required.

The question on the adoption of the amendment was then taken and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 20, nays 27.

Mr. Benton then moved to amend the bill so as to divest the secretary of the power over the distribution of the money, and place it in congress. An amendment, he said, which ought to find favor on the other side.

On the adoption of this amendment the vote stood, yeas 21, nays 27.

Mr. Sevier then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to reissue any treasury notes that may hereafter be redeemed."

This amendment was opposed by Mr. Huntington and advocated by Messrs. Sevier and Allen.

The question being taken on this amendment, the vote stood: yeas 21, nays 27.

Mr. Calhoun wanted to offer another amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, so as to allow of the issue of treasury notes, and to offer his view. Owing to the lateness of the hour and the long and exhausting session they had already passed through, he would move to adjourn.

Mr. Clay spoke of the necessity of prompt action on the loan bill, and that an adjournment would not adjourn. The bill had been already discussed at great length, but if the senator from South Carolina had anything further to offer, he (Mr. C.) would listen to him with great pleasure.

Mr. Calhoun would like to defer it until Monday, with the understanding that the question should be taken immediately after his remarks; but he would make no motion.

Mr. Allen moved an adjournment.

Mr. Clay called for the yeas and nays.

The question on adjournment stood: yeas 25, nays 25.

three and a half per cent. congress shall, out of the previous surplus, appropriate a sum sufficient for the deficit.

The question on this proposition being taken was decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrih, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sumners, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Buchanan offered an amendment to the 18th fundamental rule, providing that the bank should not discount, &c. when the notes in circulation and the private deposits, exceeded three times the amount of specie in its vaults.

The amendment was rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrih, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sumners, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, offered an amendment providing that the capital of said bank shall be distributed among the branches in proportion to the domestic exports of the states in which they are situated, and that this proportion be adjusted every five years.

It was advocated by Messrs. Clay, of Ala. Walker and Benton; and after which retired, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Pierce, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrih, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sumners, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Nicholson offered an amendment providing that if any board of directors of any of the offices of discount and deposit convert any of the notes of any value whatever, or loan with without interest any portion of the public money deposited therein for sale keeping, every such act shall be adjudged a violation of the charter. It was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrih, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sumners, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Williams offered several slight verbal amendments, which were agreed to.

Also, an amendment to the 22d fundamental article, providing that the notes of the bank shall be redeemable at the branches where paid out. This being briefly advocated by Mr. Williams and opposed by Mr. Clay, of Ky. was rejected without a division.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment striking out the clause fixing the value of gold coins to be received by the bank.

He objected to fixing the price of coins in a bank bill at all.

Mr. Clay briefly opposed it. The amendment was then rejected—yeas 22, nays 25.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment striking out the clause authorizing the ceiling in iron. This being discussed by Messrs. Benton and Henderson, it was rejected, by the same vote as that on the amendment by Mr. Buchanan, above.

Mr. Berrien offered the following amendment:

18th page, 9th sec. 2d line, strike out the words "six millions five hundred thousand dollars," and insert the words, "ten dollars on each share."

14th page, 9th sec. 28th line, strike out from the word "and," inclusive, to the end of the section, and insert the words "provided that it shall and may be lawful for the president of the United States, as soon as ten dollars on each share are paid, in manner herein provided, to appoint three directors, who shall serve until they are superseded by appointments made by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, as herein before provided; and provided, that as soon as the sum of $50,000, or in full, gold or silver coin, or in treasury notes, shall have been actually received on account of the subscriptions to the capital of the said bank, (exclusively of the subscription of ten millions aforesaid), on the part of the United States), the operations of the same shall thereupon commence and continue at the city of Washington."

Mr. Clay said the whole effect of the amendment was to bring forward the time of the bank's commencing operations one month.

After a brief discussion by Messrs. Wright and Berrien, it was adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrih, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Sumners, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Adams, of Ohio, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Young—22.

The amendments now having been completed, the bill was reported to the senate.

Mr. Clay moved to lay the bill on the table, and that it be ordered to be printed.

Mr. Calhoun suggested to the senator to move the printing alone, and leave the bill as the unfinished business for to-morrow morning.

Mr. Clay not assenting, the motion was carried.

The bill from the house, making provision for a house squadron, was twice read, and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

Mr. Berrien gave notice of his intention to move to-morrow to take up the bankrupt bill.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, July 15. The journal of Wednesday was read and approved.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. J. G. Floyd, calling for certain information in relation to the case of Alexander McLeod. Mr. Morgan was anointed in the floor.

Mr. Fillmore requested his colleagues to give way to enable the house to go into committee to resume the consideration of the fortification bill. Mr. Morgan was willing he said to do so.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, on which motion the vote stood: yeas 46, noes 14; a quorum voted.

Mr. Tappan moved a call of the house—which was ordered.

And the roll having been called, 109 members answered to their names—no quorum present.

Mr. Adams then the absentees were then called, when 149 members appeared to be present.

And a quorum being now present—an motion of Mr. Lewis Williams, all further proceedings on the call were dispensed with.

And the question recurring on the motion that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, the vote stood: yeas 68, noes 51; a quorum precisely. So the motion prevailed.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, in the chair) and resumed the consideration of house bill No. 9, being a bill making appropriations for various fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing and suppressing Indian depredations.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Clifford, appropriating $6,000 for the repairs of forts Peble and Scamuel, in Portland harbor, Maine.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Fillmore, Clifford, Prentiss, Henderson and Dawson, the question was put, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. Snyder offered an amendment appropriating $50,000 for the repairs of the fort on the Pes Patch island, in Delaware river.

The chairman declared the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. Aldrich moved an amendment appropriating $4,000 for works in the harbor of Portsmouth, N. H.—which, after a few remarks from Messrs. Aldrich, Fillmore, and Merrihew, was rejected.

Mr. Williams of Md. moved to amend the bill after the 43d line, by appropriating a sum (if necessary) for a fort at Havre de Grace, not exceeding $25,000.

Mr. Fillmore raised the point that this amendment was out of order.

The chairman decided that, under the 76th rule the amendment was not in order.

Mr. Williams appealed from the decision of the chair; and, after a few remarks from him, the question was taken—and the committee affirmed the decision of the chair.

Mr. Fillmore, for the purpose, he said, of reserving the question, as he was apprehensive that there was some mistake about the matter, would move to reduce the appropriation for Fort Washington from $35,000 to $30,000.

Mr. F. said he had addressed a letter to the secretary of war, for the purpose of ascertaining how the facts stood.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Snyder inquired of the chair whether, if he reduced the amount from $35,000 to $30,000, it was the proposition that had been rejected yesterday to $20,000 for repairs of the fort on Pes Patch island, the amendment would then be in order?

The chairman said it would.

Mr. S. then offered an amendment, which repeated the discussion of yesterday, in relation to the title to this island, and in which Messrs. Fillmore, Snyder, Toland, C. Brown, of Pa. Ferris, Gamble, Bidlake and Gordon, took part; when Mr. Snyder, at the request of his colleague (Mr. Bidlake) withdrew his amendment, announcing his intention to offer it in the house, where the sense of the house could be tested upon it.

And the bill having been gone through with—

Mr. Shapard, of North Carolina, rose, with the intention of making some general remarks on the bill, but yielded to Mr. Barnard, who expressed his desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. Barnard desired, he said to address an inquiry to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, (Mr. Fillmore). Among the recommendations from the war department for appropriations to be made, there was a sum of forty thousand dollars (Mr. B. was understood to say) proposed to be appropriated for arrearages of money already due, and for a year's salary for the purpose of preserving the public works upon various harbors and rivers.

He desired to know whether it was proposed to introduce a bill at the present session appropriating money for these purposes?

Mr. Fillmore said that the subject had been under the consideration of the committee of ways and means, and that the committee had come to the conclusion not to report in favor of the object alluded to.

Mr. Barnard said that he would propose an amendment covering the appropriations to which he had referred.

And, after some explanatory remarks, Mr. B. moved an amendment containing a number of items of appropriations for amounts due for arrearages and required for the preservation of the public property.

Mr. Fillmore said he was not less anxious than his colleague that appropriations for these objects should be made, but he (Mr. F.) felt bound to raise the point of order, in relation to the order.

If it was admitted, it opened the door to all others.

He would suggest to his colleague the propriety of disembarassing the bill, by withdrawing the amendment, and introducing a resolution in the house instructing the committee of ways and means to report on the subject.

He (Mr. F.) for one, would give such a resolution his support, because he deemed it just and right.

And if the chairman of the committee thought that this was a legitimate and proper amendment here, he (Mr. F.) would vote for it.

The chairman, remarking that it was usual to make appropriations for harbors and fortifications in different bills, ruled the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. Barnard took an appeal from the decision of the chair, which was argued for some time by Messrs. Hunt, Babcock, W. W. Lavin, Fillmore, and Barnard, when the question being put, the decision of the chair was sustained.

A lengthy discussion of the merits of the bill and the system of fortifications in general, in which Messrs. Underwood, Shepperd, Forrester, Fillmore, Rencher, Mallory, Dawson, Salmonstall, McKoy, Mason, Alford, Riall and others, participated.

Errett rose and said he desired to occupy the attention of the committee only for a few minutes.

But, in obedience to a very general call that the committee rise, Mr. E. yielded the floor for that motion, and retired.

The committee rose, and the committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And the house adjourned.

Friday, July 16. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Sedgwick, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial, asking for a repeal of the act of 1832, which admits rail road free of duty. Referred to the committee of ways and means.

By unanimous consent, petitions were presented by the following gentlemen, and were referred to the appropriate committee:—Messrs. McKim, of N. Y. Winthrop, of Mass. and Goode, of Ohio.

Mr. Garrett Davis offered the following resolutions; which were read for information:

Resolved, That the secretary of war, the secretary of the treasury, the secretary of the navy, the secretary of the postmaster general do severally report to this house, at the next session of congress, the names of persons employed in the public service, in any manner, in their respective departments, or in any business directly or indirectly connected with such departments, either in or out of Washington city; and that they also report the duties required by law and performed by all such persons; what portion of their time is required in the performance of such duties; what is their compensation severally; and the amount of emolument which may be reasonable and practicable in diminishing the number of persons so employed in the public service—excepting all soldiers, marines, and sailors, and those persons in the service of the U. States from the operation hereof.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury do report to the house of representatives at the next session, in what medium or currency the several persons employed since March, 1829, have paid the several persons within their agencies.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury do, at the next session, report to this house what sum shall have been paid into the treasury in virtue of all laws limiting the pay or other emoluments of any officer or other person in the employment of the government of the United States.

Mr. Cave Johnson offered the following amendment to the resolutions:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to lay before the house a list of all the officers of the government who he has directed to remove, and the names of the persons so removed from office or the employment of the government (other than those appointed by the president and senate) and the names of those appointed or employed in their places since the 4th of March last.

And he further resolved, That the secretary of state, the secretary of the treasury, the secretary of the navy, the secretary of war, and the postmaster general, be directed to report to this house the names of all persons removed from office or the employment of the government (other than those appointed by the president and senate) and the names of those appointed or employed in their places since the 4th of March last.

Mr. G. Davis moved the previous question.

Mr. McKay inquired of the chair whether it was in order to offer as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. Stanly inquired of the speaker whether the resolution had been received.

Some conversation took place on this point.

Mr. Davis suggested that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] to withdraw the demand for the previous question to enable him to move an amendment.

Mr. Cave Johnson insisted that he was entitled to the floor on his amendment.

The speaker decided that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] was not entitled to the floor, but that the gentleman from Kentucky, who moved the previous question, was entitled thereto.

Mr. Stanly insisted that the resolution had not been received, and that no sooner had the resolution and the amendment been read, than he objected.

The question being on seconding the demand for the previous question—Mr. Botts again asked Mr. G. Davis to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to enable him to offer the following as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Mr. Johnson].

"That they also report the names of all officers removed under similar circumstances, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the fourth of March, 1841, and to inform this house why they have not removed faithful and incompetent officers with greater dispatch than they have done."

Mr. G. Davis accepted this amendment as a modification of his own resolution.

Mr. Brown, of Pennsylvania, suggested to Mr. Botts to modify his amendment as to inquire, "and why they had removed competent and faithful officers."

Mr. Botts declined; and was understood to remark that he did so for the reason that competent and faithful officers had not been removed.

The speaker said this conversation was not in order.

Mr. Clifford desired, he said, that a division should be had on the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky. [Mr. Davis], as modified, so as to have the question taken first on the resolution as originally moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, and then on the modification as proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Stanly moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Walker asked the yeas and nays on that motion. Yeas were ordered.

Some conversation followed on a question of order.

Mr. Adams, not having been in his seat, he said, when the resolution was offered, called for the reading of the resolution and amendments.

Mr. Turley objected on the ground that the resolution had been read more than once already.

The speaker said a member had a right to have read a proposition on which he had to vote.

From this decision Mr. Turley appealed.

And the question on the appeal being taken, the house affirmed the decision of the chair.

The resolution and amendments were then again read.

Mr. Botts then explained that it was to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] that he had desired to offer his amendment, and not to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Davis]. He would be glad if the gentleman from Kentucky would withdraw the call for the previous question, so as to enable him to put his proposition in the right place.

The speaker said the question first pending was on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. [Mr. Stanly], to lay the whole subject on the table.

And the question on that motion was then taken, and decided in the negative: yeas 123, nays 114.

Mr. G. Davis said that, to enable the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Botts] to place his amendment where it properly belonged, he [Mr. D.] would withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Botts then offered his amendment as an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Mr. Johnson] and renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. Stearns submitted to the chair that the previous question had been ordered by the house, and therefore he was not to order the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Botts] to change the position of his amendment.

The speaker said, in that event, it could only be done by general consent.

Mr. G. Davis called for the reading of the resolution and amendments; which were read.

Mr. Alford rose to a point of order. He submitted to the chair that any legislation of such a description as was involved in this resolution was excluded by the rule which had been adopted for the regulation of the business at the present extra session.

The speaker said that the resolution had been received by unanimous consent, and that it was in order for the house, by unanimous consent to act on it, and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Alford] adverted.

Mr. Alford submitted to the chair that the rule was positive and imperative in its requisitions. The object of this proceeding was intended for more political capital, and he would say that very poor capital it was. He did not believe that gentlemen on either side would make any bread-crumbs out of it.

The speaker said that, as the resolution had been received by unanimous consent, it could not now, in the opinion of the chair, be ruled out of order.

Mr. Alford wished, he said, to state his point of order expressly. It was this: the house had adopted a rule in relation to the legislation of this session, which positively precluded this description of legislation; and that this resolution, although not objected to, as well as the amendment, could not be received in view of that rule, but was a direct omission to enforce that rule. For this reason he submitted that the whole subject was out of order.

The speaker decided that the subject was in order.

Mr. Alford appealed from the decision.

Mr. Lewis Williams called for the reading of the rule referred to by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Alford]; which was read.

Mr. Brown, of Penn., submitted that the resolution was in order, because (he was understood to say) the president had called particular attention to this subject-matter.

Mr. Alford said that it was only with a view to save the precious time of the house that he had interposed this point of order. He would, if any objection was made, withdraw his appeal.

So the appeal was withdrawn.

Mr. Botts (referring to the objection raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Stearns]) submitted to the speaker that the chair was mistaken in supposing that the previous question had been ordered, and that, therefore, it was not in order for him [Mr. B.] to change the position of the amendment he had offered.

The speaker said that, on a moment's reflection, he was satisfied that the previous question had not been ordered, and that, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Botts] was in order. Mr. Botts then argued and was understood to offer an amendment to the proposition of Mr. Cave Johnson, and moved the previous question.

And there was a second. And the main question was ordered to be taken.

And the main question being first on the amendment, as proposed by Mr. Botts—Mr. H. Hopkins asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKay asked division of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. [Mr. Botts]; which was ordered, in the manner hereafter mentioned.

And the question was then taken on the first branch of Mr. Botts' amendment, to wit: "That they also report the names of all officers removed under similar circumstances, since the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1841."

And it was decided in the affirmative: yeas 188, nays 4.

So the first branch of the proposition was adopted.

And the question was then taken on the second branch of the proposition, to wit:

"And also to inform this house why they have not removed faithful and incompetent officers with greater dispatch than they have done."

And it was decided in the negative: yeas 34, nays 148.

So the second branch of the proposition was rejected.

And the question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. Cave Johnson, as amended—Mr. Johnson asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Gilmer called for the reading of the proposition, which was read.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 120, nays 78.

So the amendment of Mr. Cave Johnson, as amended, was agreed to.

And the question recurring on the resolution of Mr. G. Davis, as thus amended—Mr. Andrews, of Ky. called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, were: yeas 128, nays 71.

So the resolution as amended, was adopted.

The speaker laid before the house a report from the secretary of the treasury in relation to the manner in which the act of the 14th of July, 1840, commonly called the sub-treasury law, had been carried into effect.

On motion of Mr. Proffit, the report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message, in writing, was received from the president of the United States, through John Tyler, jr., exq. his private secretary.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house resolved itself into committees of the whole on the state of the union, [Mr. Washburn, of Mass. in the chair], and to consider the bill making appropriations for the fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

The question being on the motion that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the house—Mr. C. Brown moved to amend the bill by inserting an item of $20,000 for the repair of Fort Mifflin, in the Delaware river.

Mr. Fillmore doubted if the amendment was in order, as this must be, in fact, a new work.

Mr. Brown said it was not; an appropriation had been made for it, and some of the money had been expended.

Mr. B. then proceeded to argue the necessity of the appropriation, and dwelt with much earnestness on the unprotected condition of Philadelphia.

Mr. Waterson having obtained the floor, was about to reply to the speech of Mr. Mason, made yesterday, when the chair pronounced him out of order.

Mr. Waterson, to obtain a wider range of remark, moved to amend the bill by striking out the enacting clause: a motion which, according to the rules of the house, throws open every subject connected with the bill to free debate.

Mr. W. having spoken for an hour, was followed by Messrs. Brown, Fillmore, and Chase. When, after a few remarks (one Mr. Adams) had been made, gentlemen yielded to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. W. offered the following resolution, which (the house) was adopted.

Resolved, That the secretary of war be requested to furnish a statement showing the amount of unexpended appropriations for fortifications for the year 1841, and the items in which such unexpended business may be expended.

Mr. Proffit offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after one o'clock P. M. tomorrow, all debate in committee of the whole on the bill No. 8 shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill, and the same shall then be reported to the house, with such amendments as they have been agreed to by the committee. Provided, That, nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the house at an earlier hour if it shall think proper.

Mr. P. moved the previous question.
Mr. Gilmer moved to lay this resolution on the table; which motion, by yeas 66, yeas 76, was rejected.

A motion was made that the house adjourn, which was rejected.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.
The yeas and nays were asked and ordered on taking the main question, and being taken, were: yeas 77, nays 71.

So the main question was ordered to be taken.
Mr. Medill asked the yeas and nays on the main question, and they were ordered.

Mr. Clifford moved that the house adjourn; which motion, by yeas 74, nays 77, was rejected.

And the question then recurring was taken on the main question, being on the affirmative, and was decided in the affirmative, yeas 77, nays 76.

So the resolution was adopted, and the house adjourned.

Saturday, July 17. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. Arnold rose and moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the following resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Proffit had been adopted:

Resolved, That, from and after two o'clock P. M. tomorrow, all debate in committee of the whole on house bill No. 8 shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill; and the same shall not be referred to the house with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the house at an earlier hour if it shall think proper.

And the question being on the motion to reconsider, Mr. A. addressed the house at considerable length, after he had concluded Mr. Triplet called the previous question.

And the question being taken, the vote stood—yeas 83, nays 33, a tie.

And the casting vote falling on the speaker, the gentleman voted in the affirmative.

And the vote thus stood—yeas 84, nays 83.
So the demand for the previous question was rejected.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.
Mr. Croswell inquired of the speaker if it would be in order to move a call of the house?

The speaker replied that at this time the motion came too late, the main question having been ordered.

And the question "shall the vote on the resolution be reconsidered?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 102, nays 84.

Mr. Proffit then withdrew the resolution.
Mr. Russell, from the committee on the judiciary, to whom had been referred the bill from the senate entitled "an act to amend the act to provide for taking the sixth census, or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," approved March 2, 1839, and the act amending the same.

The bill having been read twice by its title, Mr. Russell moved that it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

And the bill having been read at large, Mr. Floyd raised the question of order that the bill did not come within the rule of the house prescribing and limiting the subject-matters to be acted on at the present session of congress.

The speaker overruled the objection.
Mr. Adams and Mr. Randall, of Maryland, having risen simultaneously, the speaker gave the floor to Mr. Adams, who said he and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Randall] had risen probably for the same purpose.

He [Mr. A.] understood there was some question in relation to the return from a portion of the state of Maryland.

It is such was the fact, it seemed to be proper that the bill should be made to embrace that subject now. He would, however, yield the floor to the gentleman from Maryland, to enable him to submit such a motion as the nature of the case might require.

Mr. Randall, of Maryland, thanked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] for the floor. He [Mr. R.] would have preferred that that gentleman should have made the motion, as he had put that gentleman in possession of the facts.

Mr. R. proceeded to state that he desired to introduce an amendment in the act just reported, in order to make provision for retaking the census of Montgomery county, Maryland, which had been so defectively taken as to represent the number of the population of that county about 5,000 souls less than the number in the census of 1830. Mr. R. had in his possession proofs of these defects and omissions, and, among others, certificates from the clerk of the United States court in the district of Maryland showing that indictments had been found against some of his deputies of the marshal in that county for their malfeasance or non-feasance in office by reason of these very defects and omissions.

This amendment could not delay the completion of the census, as Montgomery county adjoins the District of Columbia, and the retaking of the census as contemplated by him could be completed and returned before the expiration of the time now allowed by the bill for the accomplishment of its objects. But this matter might be left, if thought advisable, to the discretion of the secretary of state, under whose supervision the whole subject was placed.

On motion of Mr. R. the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. Dawson, the committee on military affairs was discharged from the consideration of the memorial of Samuel Raub, in relation to a matching colored harbor and coastal waters, for scaling all the enemies of the United States in less than two years.

Mr. Sergeant, from the select committee on the currency, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee on the currency have, after this day, to sit during the session of the house.

After some explanations between Messrs. Ruffin and Sergeant in relation to the necessity for the adoption of the resolution, it was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for fortifications, for procuring and suppressing Indian hostilities.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Waterson to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—

Mr. Underwood addressed the committee generally in relation to the bill.

The speaker resumed the chair temporarily for the purpose of receiving and laying before the house a communication from the secretary of war in answer to a call for information, made under a resolution offered by Mr. Wise yesterday on the subject of the fortification bill.

The communication, having been read, was referred, on motion of Mr. Fillmore, to the committee of the whole on the state of the union having charge of the said bill, and ordered to be printed.

The chairman resumed his seat.
Mr. Ferris, of New York, spoke in defence of the bill, and more particularly in reply to the objection of Mr. Underwood.

Mr. Starnes spoke in opposition to the bill. Messrs. Burdett and Cushing supported the bill at considerable length and with much ability.

The chairman gave the floor to Mr. McKey, who yielded to a motion by Mr. Case Johnson that the committee rise.

Which motion prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Bates offered the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock on Tuesday next all debate in committee of the whole on house bill No. 8 shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on the amendments then pending to said bill, and the same shall then be reported to the house, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the house at an earlier hour if it shall think fit.

Tellers having been called for, Messrs. Boardman, of Connecticut, and McKee, of New York, were appointed. And the question on seconding the motion for the previous question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 87, nays 73.

So there was a second.
And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. Snyder, of Pennsylvania, moved that the house do now adjourn; which motion, by yeas 83, nays 90, was rejected.

And the question then recurring was taken on the main question, (being on the adoption of the resolution), and was decided in the affirmative, yeas 99, nays 84. So the resolution was adopted.

And then, on motion of Mr. Fillmore, the house adjourned until Monday, at 10 o'clock.

Monday, July 19. Mr. Hind, of Iowa, presented the memorial of James Smith and 107 others, citizens of the city of New London, praying the passage of a bankrupt law; which on motion of Mr. H. was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Adams expressed the hope that the states would be called for petitions.

Mr. Case Johnson (referring to the resolution which had been adopted to take the fortification bill out of committee to-morrow at 12 o'clock) moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of that bill.

Mr. Adams hoped not, as this was probably the last day of the present session on which petitions would be received.

And the question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Case Johnson; and, by yeas 120, nays not counted, was agreed to.

So the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, in the chair) on the bill making appropriations for various fortifications, for procuring and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Waterson to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—

Mr. McKey (who was entitled to the floor) opposed the passage of the bill at considerable length. [A message in writing was received from the president of the United States, through John Tyler, jr. his private secretary.]

Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, read a speech, in which, after objecting to the putting into the bill the appropriations for fortifications and those to pay the Georgia and Florida volunteers, he expressed his approbation of the payment of those claims, and his purpose, on the whole, to vote for the bill, though he was not so warmly convinced that it contained nothing for his own state.

Mr. Fearnden spoke in reply, and said he should not have addressed the committee had it not been for a speech of such extemporaneous eloquence as that of his colleague, and what he understood as a direct attack upon himself.

Mr. Proffit addressed the committee. He said he should vote for the appropriations; that he believed they were necessary to place the country in a proper state of defence. He reviewed sundry remarks made by various gentlemen in opposition to the bill, and he would then move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and he would then move to strike out the first section.

Mr. Waterson complied.
Mr. C. Brown also having withdrawn his amendment for the purpose of preparing for war, and not, as Mr. Wise moved to amend the bill by striking out the first section.

Mr. W. then went into a speech in support of his motion.

[A message was received from the senate through A. Dickens, esq. secretary thereof, informing this house that that body had passed the bill authorizing the raising of a loan not exceeding twelve millions of dollars.]

Mr. Fillmore replied to Mr. Wise, expressing his strong surprise that opposition to this bill should come from that gentleman.

Mr. Randall, of Maryland, made a brief speech in correction of some of the errors into which Mr. McKey, had fallen, especially in relation to the forts at Annapolis.

Mr. Dawson addressed the committee at length in support of the bill, and in reply to several gentlemen, and concluded by earnestly invoking the patriotism of gentlemen on all sides of the house in time of war to prepare for war, and not, while protecting the north, to leave the whole south defenceless.

Mr. D. having concluded, the chairman gave the floor to Mr. Jones, of Maryland, who said that he desired to make some remarks, but that, as the hour was getting late, he would more that the committee rise.

Which motion prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Jones, of Pennsylvania, presented the memorial of numerous citizens of Pittsburg, in that state, praying the establishment of a national bank; which, on motion of Mr. F. was referred to the select committee having charge of the subject.

In pursuance of notice heretofore given—Mr. Hind asked leave to introduce a resolution, to continue in force for two years the act approved March 10, 1838, entitled "an act supplementary to an act entitled 'an act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for the relief of the soldiers therein mentioned,' approved, 20th April, 1818.

Mr. H. explained that he had adopted this course instead of introducing a resolution, which he supposed he would not, under the rules, be able to get in. He considered the matter to be one of great inportance, and his object was to have the bill referred to the committee on the judiciary.

The bill having been read once by its title—Mr. Brewster rose and objected to its introduction.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the house adjourned. Tuesday, July 20. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The speaker presented a communication from the president, in relation to the law of the 10th March, 1838, which provides for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, in getting up military expeditions against foreign nations.

Also, one in relation to our citizens held in imprisonment in Van Diemen's Land, by the British government.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Mallory, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Winslow, Mr. Adams, Mr. Bates, in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for various fortifications, for armaments, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Wise to strike out the first section of the bill, Mr. Jones, of Maryland, who was entitled to the floor from yesterday, then addressed the committee during his allotted hour.

Mr. Mallory made an able speech in favor of the continuation and completion of our present system of defence adopted on the report and plan of General Bernard. He discussed the whole subject critically, showing the superiority of land fortifications over floating batteries.

Mr. Boardman said he should vote for the bill, even if it appropriated double the amount proposed. It was thought by some that a war with England was inevitable; and it was asserted that, if such should be the case, we would be whipped the first year. Why, said he, make such a degrading admission? It was not necessary that we should be whipped at any time, if we would only prepare for war when we ought to do it. He said the people would sustain them in making these appropriations. They found fault with the last administration, because it used the people's money for the purpose of corruption, and neglected these fortifications, and left them in the dilapidated state they now are.

Mr. J. H. Mason said that although he should vote for this bill, he would not do it for the purpose of giving opportunity to the late administration. He believed that the position of our foreign relations made these appropriations necessary, and in accordance with this opinion, he proposed an amendment, by inserting a provision that the first two sections thereof (i. e., those which relate to fortifications and armaments) should have no effect in the event of our difficulties with Great Britain being brought to an amicable termination, of which fact the president should judge, &c. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. Walz opposed the bill on the ground that it was unnecessary—there being sufficient unexpended appropriations on hand.

Twelve o'clock having arrived, the debate ceased, and the house proceeded to act on the amendments, pending and offered in silence.

After they had been passed upon. The committee rose and reported the bill to the house with amendments.

Mr. Bates moved the previous question on the different sections of the bill and the amendments, which was acceded to, and the house proceeded to act on the amendment reported from the committee.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, after which Mr. L. W. Adams moved that that the third reading of the bill be postponed to Monday week.

The house refused to postpone, yeas 88, nays 124. Mr. G. Durin said there was last year a deficit in the revenue of $7,000,000, and there would be a deficiency this year of $8,000,000, from what was exhibited on this floor, it was quite problematical whether the revenue bill could pass. He thought that this bill should come in the rear of that one, and not appropriate millions, when there was nothing to pay it with.

Mr. Green moved to lay the bill on the table.—This motion was decided by yeas and nays in the negative, as follows—yeas 80, nays 124.

Mr. Winthrop moved the previous question, which was seconded.

Mr. McKim asked the yeas and nays on the main question; which ordered, and, being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Averett, Backus, Baker, Barnard, Barnes, Bidwell, Bridges, Briggs, Boardman, Bowne, Bowne, Bowne, Briggs, Brockway, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burnett, Wm. Butler, William O. Butler, Cabot, Canby, William B. Campbell, T. J. Campbell, Carothers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, Wise—66.

The bill was passed as it was reported from the committee of ways and means, without amendment.

Mr. Wise gave notice that he should move that the house go into committee of the whole on the ordinance bill to morrow. And the house adjourned.

Wednesday, July 21. The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Petitions were presented by Messrs. Chapman, of Alabama, and Burke, of New Hampshire, and appropriately referred.

Mr. Filmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following resolution, which was adopted.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to lay before the house any communication from the French minister in the security of the navy, relating to our commerce and navigation with France under existing treaties.

Mr. Filmore, from the same committee, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the message of the president of the United States and accompanying documents as relates to the Potomac bridge, and that the same be referred to the committee for the District of Columbia, which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Filmore, from the same committee, moved to be discharged from so much of the message and accompanying documents of the president of the United States as relates to the post office department; and that the same, together with a communication from the secretary of the treasury, enclosing a statement from the auditor of the post office department in relation to temporary clerks, be referred to the committee on the post office and post roads, and to the committee on commerce, &c. be printed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Winthrop, from the committee on commerce, made a report in favor of a revision of the tariff, accompanied by a resolution to appoint a committee to sit in the recess and collect information, with a view to report a proper system of duties at the next session.

A debate arose upon the resolution.

Mr. Winthrop explained the report, and the objection.

Mr. Wise moved to lay it on the table. He inveighed against any interference with the compromise act. The resolution was the initiatory step to a protective tariff. He doubted the power of the house to constitute a committee to sit during the recess.

Mr. Ingersoll supported the resolution, and maintained the power to create such a committee.

Mr. Adams violently opposed it as a scheme to introduce a protective tariff.

Mr. Niles advocated the resolution. He was an anti-tariff man, but he wanted information. He did not consider this as necessarily involving a design to revive a protective tariff. He thought that the people of the south, and the gentlemen of South Carolina and himself among them, would have to abandon some of their former positions, though still resolute against a protective system.

A largely increased revenue was necessary, and must be raised by impost.

Mr. Wise presented his objections to the creation of the committee, as a point of order, under the parliamentary law. The chair decided against Mr. Wise. Messrs. Briggs and Williams stated cases in support of the chair. Mr. Gilmer then spoke on the subject of the resolution. He was very desirous of collecting information, practical facts, on the subject of a tariff, but feared that the committee would be made too exclusive in its character, and that the bill would be ex parte. But it might present information from all sections and classes, from the planters of the south and the graziers of the west, as well as the manufacturers of the north.

Mr. Briggs occupied the floor; but the morning hour having elapsed, Mr. B. gave way to a motion by Mr. Wise, that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Underwood and Mr. Sargent requested Mr. Wise to withdraw his motion momentarily to enable them to make reports.

Mr. W. assented thereto.

Mr. Sargent, from the select committee on the currency, reported a bill to incorporate the sobriety of the committee, the bill from the senate, to repeal the act commonly called the anti-bureaucratic law; which said bill was read twice by its title.

On motion of Mr. Williams, of Md. the amendments were read. And on motion of Mr. Sargent, the bill and amendments were referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Underwood, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill, accompanied by a report, to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia on certain conditions.

On motion of Mr. D. the bill and report were referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Barnard, from the committee on the judiciary, made a report, accompanied by a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The bill was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. B. the bill and report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Briggs was understood to move that 2,000 extra copies of the report be printed.

Mr. Barnard from the committee on the judiciary, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for the house to take up the bankruptcy bill reported from the committee on the judiciary for consideration at the present session of congress.

Mr. B. stated that he presented the resolution in obedience to the instructions of the committee, though he was himself opposed to it. He desired the action of congress on the bankruptcy law this session.

Mr. Milton Brown, as one of the committee, also expressed his dissent from the resolution, and moved to lay it on the table.

The house voted to lay it on the table—yeas 118, nays 81.

On the motion of Mr. Wise, then resolved itself into committee of the whole, (Mr. Gilmer in the chair), on the bill to provide for the support of a home squadron.

Mr. Wise explained the objects of the bill, and moved an amendment to make it optional with the secretary to use two steamers or employ any other equally efficient force.

Mr. J. Q. Adams opposed the amendment with great earnestness. He insisted that it was as the most important and useful portion of the proposed naval force. (Mr. Wise withdrew the amendment.) Mr. Adams briefly advocated the bill. He pointed to the urgent importance of such a measure in view of the grasping and pygmy spirit of the British government, which was now sending its men-of-war to survey, explore and sound all the shores and waters of the western hemisphere.

Mr. McKay objected to the form of the bill, as not sufficiently specific as to the details of the appropriations.

Mr. King advocated the bill, and went into the whole subject, as a member of the naval committee.

After a debate, in which Messrs. Gordon, Barnes, Folsom, McKim, Rogers, and others took part, the committee rose and reported the bill.

The bill was then passed—yeas 184, nays 8. The house adjourned at two o'clock.

CONGRESSIONAL ABSTRACT. Business is now progressing in congress. The appropriation for the HOME SQUADRON, passed the house of representatives by a vote of 184 to 8. The sum appropriated is $739,240, for the construction and outfit of two frigates, two sloops, two armed steamers and some small vessels. The able report made upon the subject by Mr. KING, of Georgia, from the committee on naval affairs, we have in type, and shall be inserted in our columns, with a prefatory note of two millions, with a view of dispensing with the treasury note system, has passed both houses and been signed by the president—as has also the bill for the relief of the widow of WILLIAM H. HANNAH. Mr. CHASE's bill for establishing yet under discussion in the senate having gone through with the amendments proposed, the bill has been reprinted and ordered to be printed; meanwhile a bill similar in its provisions, has been reported and is now before the house of representatives. The bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, having passed the house, now awaits the action of the senate, and the bill repealing the sub-treasury law, having passed the senate now awaits the action of the house. Mr. SARGENT has introduced a bill to whom it was referred, reported it with some amendments on Wednesday last. Bills making appropriations for progressing with fortifications—for the relief of the lunatics of the District of Columbia, and the navy pension bill, have several times passed the house. A bankrupt bill, similar in its provisions to the one that passed the senate last session, was reported in the house on Wednesday, and also a bill to extend the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia.

CHRONICLE.

ABSTRACTION. The art appears to have been reduced to a science, and not infrequently, but generally avoided. One day's mail last week brought in accounts of three several banks having entered, locks and bolts to the contrary notwithstanding, and seven more and counting have been entered by burglars on Monday night last in Philadelphia.

Another great robbery has been perpetrated; 90,000 dollars was abstracted from the branch of the State Bank of Illinois, at Jackson, by means of false keys—the night of the 11th inst. Of this sum $75,000 was in paper, $17,000 in notes of the parent bank, and the rest comprised in notes of the several branches; $5,000 in gold and $4,000 in silver. The stolen books and papers of the institution were wantonly mutilated. Five thousand dollars reward has been offered.

THE UNION BANK OF MARYLAND. A meeting of the stockholders recently convened, for the purpose of examining the condition and determining whether to continue in operation or to wind up the concern. The condition of the institution was diligently inquired into, and reported, first by a board of directors who report the stock originally $100, to be worth $73.96 without bonus or $75.39 with bonus included. This report was referred to a committee of the stockholders, who made a careful examination, arrived at the conclusion that the bank ought to continue in operation, only one of the committee dissenting. This report has been assented to, and the bank is therefore to continue its operations.

ERNEST BLACKMAR. departed this life at Thompson, Connecticut, on the 12th ult. in the 99th year of his age. He was the son of James Blackmar, and born in Gloucester, Rhode Island, in August, 1742—some thirty-one years before the American revolution. He was in the troops raised in the British colonies to take the island of Cuba, under the earl of Albemarle and Admiral Prescott, in a regiment commanded by Major General Putnam. He was in Captain John Spaulding's company, of Plainfield; lieutenant Smith and ensign Pennington, of Killybeg, General Lyman, of Springfield, of Northampton, and Col. Putnam, of Plainfield. He was without doubt the last surviving soldier at the taking of the Fort Mifflin, and the oldest in serving on the side of King George the third. He sustained through life the character of an honest and upright citizen, and returned to the last, in a great degree, his body and mental powers.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY. The receipts into the treasury of this society, from the 20th of January to the 11th July, the present year, amount to $1,754.18, being $24.31 more than were received during the same period last year. The African Repository says "should a similar increase be realized for the remainder of the present year, the society will be able to carry on its ordinary business of the society, and do much toward the extinguishment of the old debt, if not to cancel it entirely."

COTTON. Charleston, July 17. More inquiry for the article. Sales 3,049 bales at 8 to 10 cents.—See Journal de mer.

DR. DE MONT. "the companion of Emmet in the attempted revolution of Ireland, long years ago, and in the subsequent imprisonment and exile with which that attempt was punished," died at New York, where he had become estranged in the practice of medicine.

on Monday the 12th inst. in the 79th year of his age.

Robert Raymond Reed, late governor of Florida, died at Tallahassee, on the 2d instant, of congestive fever. He has been in some measure identified with the "true and progress" of that territory, and before the emigration thither held important offices in the state.

ERIE HARBOR. The Erie Observer of the 2d instant says, the schooner Experiment, captain Downs, sailed from this port on Monday evening last for Providence, Rhode Island, with 100 passengers, and 100 tons of cargo, and a little strange to our readers for us to state that vessel leave our beautiful harbor for ports on the Atlantic; but strange as it may appear, it is true, and the time is not distant when we will see vessels, in the port of Proque Island, that have sailed across the Atlantic. At Buffalo, captain Downs intends to take down the masts of his vessel and pass through the New York and Erie canal to the Hudson.

FIRE. The Huntsville Democrat reports the destruction by fire, of the bell factory in Madison county, Ala. owned by Messrs. Patton, Donagan & Co. together with about 100 bales of cotton. The loss estimated at from thirty to forty thousand dollars.

FLORIDA. It is believed that the five different detachments which Col. Worth has directed to visit various places in Florida, will be the means of breaking up the planting grounds and strong holds of the hostile Indians.

Cocacoe and his band, who, our readers may recollect, were captured some time since, and sent to New Orleans, have been recaptured by the forces of Colonel Worth, in Florida, where it is contemplated to use him in the future conduct of the war.

FLOUR. There were 6,335 bbls. and 640 half bbls. inspected last week in Baltimore—prices range from $3.50 to $5.75.

McLellan case. By the decision of the supreme court of New York, inserted in the number of the Register, the prisoner is remanded for a jury trial. We learn that the idea of appealing from the decision of the supreme court to the court for the correction of errors, has been rejected, and that the case will be argued in the prisoner's counsel, is removed to Onondaga, where the prisoner is now in custody, awaiting his trial by a jury of his country. The trial is to take place in September.

MISCELLANEOUS. An English paper states that the owner of an ambulating menagerie lately calculated that all the ferocious animals which are now confined in Europe were lost in an immense forest, it would contain 228 lions, 389 tigers, 102 leopards, 220 panthers, 67 elephants, 10 rhinoceroses, 3,700 wolves, 77 rattle snakes, 216 box coconuts, 1,040 hives, and 96 crocodiles.

Managers. Numerous applications to the department for appointments continue to be made, notwithstanding the fact has been made public, that the corps was filled in overflowing pretensions to the 4th March last, and that consequently no vacancies exist.

NEW YORK STATISTICS OF THE CITY. A new business directory gives the following as among the most numerous trades and professions in New York: Commission merchants about 600; importers (58 classes) 244; grocers 365; lawyers 596; brokers, (67 classes) 214; auctioneers 59; hotel-keepers 229; restaurateurs 70; hardware dealers 61; hide and leather dealers 43; bookellers and publishers 64; newspaper 48; periodicals 64; printers 106; druggists 83; hatmakers 17; tailors 74; hat dressmakers 42.

POTATO BUSINESS. New England with a territory scarcely as large as our country of Appaling, produces, according to the late census, 24,435,831 bushels "Irish potatoes annually." Where do they find room, in that little country to pile them up? Thirty-four bushels, one only think! At twenty cents a bushel, (they are worth here a dollar and a half) the potato crop of little New England amounts to over seven millions of dollars! For the entire country crop of Georgia for the last year, for ten cents a pound! Besides this, the same New England makes, one year with another, it seems, 2,192,062 bushels of wheat, and 15,195,972 bushels of other grain—wheat, at three cents a bushel, amounts to upwards of ten millions of dollars! How many bushels of wooden nutmegs, horn gum flints, poplar hams, &c. &c. these same enterprising chaps have made, the census does not inform us.

[Memo (Sta) Telegraph.]

PRESIDENTIAL. A meeting was held in the county of Philadelphia on Monday 12th instant which recommended General Cass, as a candidate for the presidency.

RUNAWAY SLAVE AFFAIR. Yesterday the bark Kanawha, Leckie, master, arrived here from Mobile, with a slave, who had stowed himself away on board, unobserved by the crew and master. The owners of the vessel, Messrs. A. & C. Cunningham, forthwith sued the fugitive gentleman, for his passage, which they charged at seventy dollars, and had him arrested for that amount by constable Clapp, who committed him to jail. The colored man was held in the common jail, and manifested some excitement about it, which terminated in their peaceably bailing him out. In the meantime, too, the abolitionists were on the qui vive, and S. S. Seawell, esq., obtained a writ of habeas corpus to bring the slave before the supreme court, to be released; but he had not been out before the officer, named Frank, reached the jail, and the supreme court, precept. He has, therefore, nothing more to do than to rail road and steamboat to Canada, and become one of queen Victoria's loving subjects. [Just Post.]

STEAM BRIDGE. The St. Louis Argus describes the following: "A striking use of the steam engine has been adopted for crossing the Mississippi. It is a floating bridge, seventy feet long, and sixty feet wide, impelled by two engines of twenty horse power, and making the passage (2,000 feet) at the speed of about 350 feet a minute. The bridge draws, with all its machinery, but two feet. This capital invention will naturally supersede the awkward contrivances of bridges of boats on the great European rivers, and will not improbably obviate the formidable expense of building bridges, and must greatly facilitate communication in colonies and new settlements in every part of the world."

STAMMERS. The Britten left Boston on Saturday, carrying 100 stammers, and 39 barrels of Hulfia; she carried also 50,000 letters and 12,000 papers. She passed the Calcutta off Cape Island, in Boston harbor.

STOCKS. United States bank shares at New York, 17; Indiana 95; $27,000 at 56.57.

SCAL. Some of the spirited planters of Cuba are taking steps to improve the quality of the sugar cane. A company has been formed, with a view to the raising and seed a parcel of 400 tons burrito to Oahu to give a cargo of the cane indigenous to that island for planting out in Cuba.

SUCIDES IN FRANCE. It appears from an official document recently published, that the number of suicides in France increases each year. In the number of suicides amounted to 2,577, being 161 more than in 1833, 303 more than in 1837, and 407 more than in 1836. The department of the Seine was the most prolific source of the entire, 668 females are returned among the suicides. Each period of life, from infancy to old age, has paid its tribute to this malady. There are two periods, first, from birth to marriage, and second, from marriage to old age. In the first, there are 102, two of twelve, two of thirteen, three of fourteen, many of fifteen, 147 of sixteen to twenty-one, 335 of 21, 183 of twenty and forty-one of eighty. The means most frequently employed were hanging, strangulation and suffocation. 955 individuals drowned themselves. 149 attached themselves with the fumes of charcoal, which appears to be the principal mode resorted to by the Parisians.

SIX STROKE. An eminent physician at New Orleans avers his belief that men stroke kills by epilepsy of the lungs, and not of the brain; in which opinion he has been confirmed by every dissection he has made within the last two years.

TEAPARTY. On Thursday afternoon last, at 5 o'clock, the farmers, mechanics and ladies assembled in the lot of the Messrs Osborn, in Pleasant street. About 1,200 individuals were given out, which called forth the farmer and his lux, the mechanic and his apprentice, and all, as far as possible, to join in a purely democratic and "right down good time." So it was a beautiful day and delightful sport were selected; a gaily band of music employed; an abundance of cake and lemonade provided; and about 800 ladies and gentlemen collected to enjoy their perquisites to pleasure. After sunset, a procession numbering about 400 was formed, which proceeded to the Town Hall to pass off the remainder of the evening in a dance. [Northampton Courier.]

TORRONS. Our last quotations of this article are fully sustained by the following: The quantity of wheat of the inspections of the last week in Baltimore comprised 353 Maryland, 392 Ohio, 7 Virginia and 10 Kentucky—total 765.

TRAVELLING. The number of passengers between New York and Philadelphia in a year amounts to nearly 200,000. The New York and New Jersey has carried $30,000 from a tax of ten cents on each passenger.

WATERFORD. Saratoga county, New York. A fire which originated in a small building for storing lime, in the village of Waterford, on the afternoon 11th inst., raged for three hours with fury, first to consume seventy or eighty buildings, fifty of them dwelling houses, besides the Episcopal church, Academy, the Manual School, and Saratoga County bank. Loss estimated at $150,000.

WATERING PLACES. Saratoga has a large number of victuaries, and the hotels are crowded with gay and fashionable people.

WATER IN LONDON. The quantity of water daily supplied to the city differs very much from that of London in 1833 it was 21,110,555 imperial gallons; furnishing each individual of its population, a daily supply of about ten gallons of this chief article of life.

WHEAT. New Maryland wheat brought $1 25, and new Virginia red $1 15, in Baltimore market last Saturday.

COMFATATIVE POWER IN THE NEW ARMY OF WAR.
British war steamers.—According to the navy list for the 1st of April, the following is the number of steam vessels in her majesty's service at that period:—Steamers aloft on the high sea 78, of which 25 are mail packets at various stations; steamers aloft on the lakes of Canada, 4; steamers building, 22; general total, 104, of which several were above 300 horse power, and a greater number above 200.

Very few war steamers are building. The number of the marine for 1842, the number of French war steamers is fixed at about 34 aloft, of which only 6 are of 220 horse power, and none above.

Le Rochefort states that, unusual activity has of late been displayed by the naval armament of Rochester in fitting out ships of war. Besides the ships of the line Indefatigable and the frigate La Gloire, the steam frigate Gomer, which was only commenced in January last, is nearly completed. Le Rochefort adds that this immense frigate is 27 feet longer than the Hercules of 100 guns, and the distance between her main peak and the point of her jibboom is 320 feet, which is equal to the height of the pillar to the Place Vendôme placed upon the batteries of the town of New Orleans. It will consume 94 tons of coal per day to animate, this colossal.

After the Gomer is finished, four large steamboats of 450 horse power will be commenced, and afterwards the Coscatores, Monge and Infernal, in all, nine steam frigates. Two warships, the Capitaine and Messenger, and the cutter Le Balin, will be launched at the same time as the Gomer.

Russian steamers.—Late advices from St. Petersburg say there are now aloft on the Neva, 34 steam vessels, of which 15 belong to the crown, and the rest to companies or individuals.

Launch of the Trafalgar.—The anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar, was commemorated by the launch of one of the finest war vessels ever built in the dock yards of England, at Woolwich, in the presence of the queen. A ship launch is always a favorite spectacle with English sight-seers; and the new vessel being one of the largest in the first class of line-of-battle ships, rated as 120 guns, but actually mounting more, the occasion was one of great interest. The concourse was numerous beyond all precedent.

Looking downward to the keel, and upward to the bulwarks, the height of the vessel was tremendous. The ship, as we have said, is registered to carry 120 guns; and from the fore head to stern is 246 feet 2 inches; extreme breadth 55 feet 7 inches; depth of the hold 32 feet 2 inches; its burden upward of 2,711 tons [old measurement]; its height 64 feet 11 inches. On the poop were crowded the queen, the royal family, and the courtiers, with the hussars, and the row of their weather-beaten, wrinkled visages, topped with three-cornered hats that became them as well as oak-crests would have done, looked like a quaint ornamental standing to the sides.

Opening throughout of the Great Western railway.—This magnificent railway is opened throughout the line between London and Bristol, 120 miles. From Bristol to Bridgewater has been so for some weeks. The Great Western railway would have been open so long since, but for the tunnel through Box-hill, [six miles from Bath], which is nearly three miles in length, principally cut through stone. The difficulty and danger of forming this monster tunnel were looked upon as so great, that some time ago it was about to be let out to undertake the work, and it was at one period intended to carry the railway around instead of through the hill. After very great difficulties and impediments, the tunnel has been completed, and will remain a wonderful monument of the power of human intellect and industry. Between Bristol and Bath alone, a distance of about twelve miles, there are six tunnels some of them of great length. The summit of the level of the whole line is at Swindon, 76 miles from London, and 27½ feet above the terebras at Bristol. In February, 1836, the works were commenced, the original estimate of which was two millions and a half sterling; but the actual outlay has been more than double that amount—expended of twenty millions of dollars. The distance from London to Bridgewater to be achieved in five and a half hours, and persons will be able to travel from London to Bristol in about four hours—120 miles.

The Austrian minister. Mr. Marschal, also leaves us, for the court of the young queen of Portugal.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN TEXAS AND THE U. STATES.

Through the politeness of a gentleman, one of the engineering corps, we learn that the commissioners who have, for some time, been engaged in running the boundary line between the U. States and the Texan republic, completed their appointment at the north end on Thursday, the 24th ultimo. The line strikes Red river one mile and a half above the White Oak shanty, near Mr. David Lloyd's, on range 28, about fifty yards below range 29. The timber has been cut about two feet on each side of the line, making an opening of twenty feet the whole length of the line; mounds have also been raised at every mile, five feet high.

[Arkansas State Gaz.]

THE MEXICAN COMMISSIONERS. The Mexican says that the house of commissioners appointed under the convention of the 11th of April, 1839, between the United States and Mexico, to adjust certain claims of citizens of the former against the latter, have been in session in Washington about one year. The board consists of four commissioners, two on each side, their secretaries and an umpire. A report from the American commissioners, of the progress and condition of the commission, under date of the 26th of May last, addressed to the United States senate, and published by order of the senate. From this it appears that great differences of opinion have arisen between the two sides as to the powers and duties of the board. The Mexican commissioners, it seems, took their oaths before each other and then swore their secretary, and a discussion on the validity of this oath occupied the board a week. Then a discussion arose upon the rules of proceeding, which occupied the board some weeks. The Mexican commissioners pretending that the two governments were the parties litigant, that no claimant should be allowed to come before them, and that no document would be received by them unless it came through the department of state. The American commissioners were compelled to yield, after long but vain opposition, to these unjust rules of proceeding. Owing to the great delay occasioned by the difficulties raised by the Mexican commissioners, it was not until the 28th day of December, 1840, that the first case came before the board for a hearing on its merits. The denial of access to the claimants, and the circuitous method of obtaining proofs, and the whole course of the Mexicans have embarrassed all the proceedings, and tended very much to bring the convention to naught. One of the claimants, Mr. Santangelo, has published a pamphlet, in which the proceedings of the convention are strongly objected to, and the conduct of the Mexican commissioners particularly censured.

The following cases have been brought to a hearing and awards made by the board in favor of the claimants, since January last:

Peter Harmooy,	$11,130
J. J. Astor & Son, New York,	37,661
Boardman & Pope, Boston,	27,461
Hitty Green, Key West,	16,941
Samuel Chew, Philadelphia,	18,291
Smith Thompson, New Haven,	2,098
Theodore Deering,	2,434
Francis H. Arnold, and others,	84,062
Ratchefs Hicks, Rhode Island,	15,452
Richard J. Arnold, do.	7,726
J. Nicholson, am't of A. L. Duncan,	138,824
Louisa Livingston, ex'x. of E. Livingston,	45,279
John C. West,	48,452
W. H. Sines and wife,	32,699

Total, $908,381

Eleven other cases have been discussed and sent to the umpire with the arguments pro and con, as far back as May. Only one claim has been rejected, but a number have been laid aside or suspended, some because they are not among the claims that lawfully come before the board, and others because additional documents and explanations are wanting. "A large number of cases," it is judged, are yet to be submitted for examination, so that there seems to be no immediate prospect of the sitting of the board being brought to conclusion. The American commissioners are, William L. Mary and John Rowan; the Mexican, Senores Joaquin Valazquez de Leon and Pedro Fernandez del Castillo.

THE FORTIFICATION BILL passed on Tuesday in the house of representatives, by the decision of yeas and nays, 149 yeas, and 100 nays, in favor of 148 to 66. We copy from the National Intelligencer, the bill.

A bill making appropriations for fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

For Fort Pickens, Pensacola harbor, Florida, twenty thousand dollars.

For Fort Barrancas, Pensacola harbor, Florida, forty-five thousand dollars.

For Fort Morgan, Mobile point, Alabama, forty thousand dollars.

For Fort Livingston, Barrataria bay, Louisiana, thirty thousand dollars.

For repairs of other forts on the approaches to New Orleans, Louisiana, fifty thousand dollars.

For engineering of fortifications, fifteen thousand dollars.

For incidental expenses, attending repairs of fortifications, fifty-five hundred dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and are hereby, appropriated in like manner:

For current expenses of ordnance service, twenty-five thousand dollars.

For purchase of ordnance and ordnance stores, seventy-five thousand dollars.

For armament of fortifications, one hundred thousand dollars.

For purchase of saltpetre and brimstone, twenty thousand dollars.

Section 3. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be in like manner appropriated:

For preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, viz:

For balance required, in addition to the sum applicable out of the amount appropriated at the last session of congress, for arrangements of pay due Florida militia called into service by the governor of the territory to eighteen hundred and forty, nineteen thousand three hundred and eighty-eight dollars and two cents.

For arrangements of pay due Florida militia, commanded by brigadier general Reed, for six months in the service of the United States, commencing November, eighteen hundred and forty, and terminating April, eighteen hundred and forty-one, two hundred and ninety-seven thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars and ninety-two cents.

For arrangements of pay due to a battalion of Georgia militia, for services on the frontiers of Georgia and Florida, in eighteen hundred and forty and eighteen hundred and forty-one, twenty-eight thousand four hundred and ninety-five dollars and ninety-two cents.

For the quartermaster's department, the sum of four hundred and forty thousand and forty dollars, that being the amount required in addition to the amount appropriated at the last session of congress, which last sum of money for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities are to be expended under the direction of the secretary of war, conformably to the acts of congress of the 19th of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and the acts therein referred to.

THE ARMY.

St. Augustine, July 16. Yesterday the flag at St. Francis' barracks was suspended at half-mast, and a salute of guns fired from Fort Marion, in tribute to the late commander-in-chief, gen. Maromb.

Major Churchill, major Mapes, and capt. Heintzelman, United States army arrived in town Sunday last. These officers together with captain Conner, who had previously arrived, constitute a board for the examination of claims, and immediately entered upon their official duties. Major Churchill president, and Mr. Tolle, recorder of the board.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 24.

Head quarters of the army, adj. gen. office, Washington, June 22, 1841.

I. The attention of the president of the United States has been called to the ease of captain G. C. Hutter of the 2d regiment of infantry, recently tried by a general court martial, and sentenced thereof, reprimanded in orders, and required to join his company in Florida. Instead of complying with said order, the captain, after communicating to the department of war his dissatisfaction at the proceedings of the general-in-chief in his case, expressed his intention to go, and has actually proceeded from Lynchburg, Virginia, to St. Louis, Missouri, for the transference of some private business, without asking authority therefor, and has for two months been absent from his regiment without leave and without reporting himself to the proper authority.

After a careful consideration of the whole subject, the president, availing no palliation for this open dereliction of duty, contempt of authority, and disobedience of a positive order on the part of captain Hutter, deems it due to the public interest, and necessary to the maintenance of discipline, that he should be dropped from the rolls of the army. Accordingly captain Hutter will cease to be an officer from the date of this order.

II. First lieu. R. C. Ashton, adjutant of the 2d regiment of dragoons, having obtained a short leave of absence on false pretences, being now absent without authority, and under circumstances which would justify the most severe action to be taken from his regiment, and having, moreover, embezzled public and private funds in his trust for disbursement and safe keeping, is, by direction of the president of the United States, dismissed from the service with disgrace.

By order of Alexander Macomb, major general commanding-in-chief.

L. THOMAS, Assistant adjutant general.

THE NAVY.

A slip from the office of the Norfolk Beacon, dated July 24, 7 P. M. has the following:

"The U. S. stoop of war Fairfield, commander Talmat, came up from Hampton Roads to-day and anchored off Lambert's Point, (wind and tide being ahead) where she fired a salute, which was answered from the Pennsylvania, bearing the broad pennant of com. Morris. We learn that she is coming up for the purpose of having some alteration made in her cabin for the accommodation of capt. Burgess, who will proceed to the Mediterranean in her. The U. S. stoop of war Cyane, at present lying at the navy yard at Gosport, was put in commission to-day. Commander James Armstrong has been appointed to her command. We understand her crew will be crewed in a few days. Her destination is supposed to be the Brazil station.

The U. S. ship of the line Delaware, bearing the broad pennant of com. Morris, remains in Hampton Roads. Com. Morris has not yet reached here. The sloop of war George Macdonald, and the U. S. stoop of war Warren, of the West India squadron, were spoken off Charleston on the 18th instant. They were bound north.

The Vernoe at Boston from Buenos Ayres, reports that the schooner Eclipse, sailed thence May 25, for Montevideo and Rio Janeiro.

Ship Kremlin, formerly of Boston, purchased by the Buenos Ayres government, for a ship of war, was named the "Twenty fifth of May," and was to mount 28 guns, 18 and 24 pounders.

The ship of war, com. commander Voorhees, was at Marselles, June 25, for Mahon next day, and thence to Gibraltar.

From the Pacific. Advices from Lima have been received by the New York Journal of Commerce by the ship of war, com. commander Voorhees.

The U. S. frigate Constitution, captain Daniel Turner, was at Lima on the 20th May and would sail for the United States in the beginning of July. The stoop of war Yorktown, capt. Anlick, is nearly ready for sea, bound for the Sandwich, Society and Friendly Islands and New Zealand; the U. S. ship of war "Dale" com. Maunsell was at London, but expected shortly to take a cruise to leeward, perhaps as far as Guayaquil. The U. S. schooner Shark, lieu. comd. Bigelow, was on a cruise to Payson, Guayaquil, &c.

We learn that the U. S. ship Delaware 71, bearing the broad pennant of commodore Morris, is expected to arrive in Annapolis Roads forthwith.

THE CONTEST FOR TRADE.

In proof of the position which we assume in the Register, of the 17th instant, of the approach of a trying contest with the most powerful government upon earth for our fair share of the trade of the world, we refer our readers to three several articles contained in the present number. The first of those is the report of the committee of the house of representatives upon naval affairs. The committee have attended almost exclusively to the belligerent aspect of the facts they exhibit. In that aspect they are imposing and alarming. The subject of this country to a contest of what is required for the safety of their lives and property. But that is an uncertain, and we sincerely hope, a remote contingency, though it is one for which the country ought to be prepared, as being the very best and cheapest method of averting it.

But the facts contained in the report alluded to, viewed in another aspect, exhibit an immediate—'we had like to have said inevitable danger to the trade and commerce of this country, which requires instant and the most effectual measures to counteract. It is a giant grasp that the British government are in the act of making for a monopoly of the intercourse between the various sections of the globe. We have not space to devote in remarks of our own upon the subject at present, and therefore simply direct the attention of our readers to the document referred to, and to the following extract which we take from the New Orleans Bix, which reached us by the last mail, as illustrating the facts to which special attention should be directed.

"The Royal Mail Steam Packet company. The following account of the Royal Mail Steam Packet company and their steamers, which is the course of a few months are to be the subject of a very monthly paper, as often inwards, has been communicated to us from an authentic source, and cannot fail to prove interesting to our readers.

The capital of the company is £1,500,000 in 18,000 shares of £80 each. The direction of the company is placed in the hands of the most eminent merchants in London. The company is incorporated under a royal charter from the crown, and for the express purpose of performing the public service of carrying the mails between England and a large portion of the western world. By their charter the company cannot own any vessel but such as are engaged under contract with the government, nor can they go to any port or place save those to which under such contracts they may be directed to proceed. The present contract extends to a period of ten years from the time of starting, and the remuneration is £240,000 per annum during peace, to be increased 25 per cent. should war arise. The mails on board of every steamer will be carried at the absolute charge of an officer of the royal navy, who will be paid a salary of £1,000 per annum, and express authority. To distinguish them from men of war, and at the same time to keep them under the denomination of national vessels, they will carry a particular British post office flag.

The steamers appropriated for this gigantic service are 14 in number, about 450 horse power and 1,600 tons burthen each. Of these, twelve will be constantly in active service with a spare steamer in England and one in this quarter of the world. They will be employed in carrying the mails, and in order that such may be able to take in its turn, the long voyage to England, by which means each will return to that country twice every year, and thus whatever repairs may become necessary may be readily and easily made. They are intended chiefly to carry passengers. Each cabin passenger will have a separate berth, six feet and a half in length, by seven and eight feet in height and neatly fitted-up, and furnished. There will be a separate state room and cabin for ladies, and the berths are so constructed that two can be thrown into one for the convenience of families. Each vessel will contain about one hundred such berths; the whole properly aired and ventilated. Each vessel will carry one large gun on the stern, and perhaps two upon deck. The crews will be chosen from the most skillful and experienced architects and engineers of Great Britain. They are a little larger than the vessels in Cunard's line, and may consequently be expected to perform their voyages with equal if not greater celerity, especially when it is considered that by far the greater portion of their work will be done in a milder and more settled climate than the north.

The combination under which these steamers are to work, embraces a regular conveyance backwards and forwards twice every month, with every port in place, insular and continental, from Surinam on the east, to the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico on the west, and from Halifax by New York on the north, to Chagres on the south—the whole work on given points, so that there is not a day lost in the transmission of the mails either outwards or inwards, for as one steamer arrives at any given point, one or more are ready to start on other lines of the combination.

As the transmission of the mails no more time is occupied at any place, than is sufficient to exchange mails and passengers. The course outwards from Europe to this port, is by Madeira, (probably also Corunna), Barbadoes, St. Thomas, Porto Rico and Havana. The time calculated to accomplish it including stoppages, is 25½ days. The course to England is by Havana, Nassau and Fayal. The time from New Orleans to London will be 22 days; but should the steamers perform their work at the average rates of Cunard's line, the time between New Orleans and London, both outwards and inwards, will be nearly two days less either way. At Nassau the great line is connected with North America, and it also connects all North America with the whole of the West Indies, including the coast of South America and the Gulf of Mexico. A sailing vessel connects Madeira with Fayal. From New Orleans to New York, by Havana and Nassau, will occupy from 8 to 9 days each way. From New Orleans to Surinam will occupy 8 days; to the Cape of Good Hope, 10 days; to New Orleans to Barbadoes, 9 to 9½ days; from New Orleans to Lagayra, the same period, and so on, in equal proportions, throughout the whole extent of the line.

The course of the steamers throughout the different lines is so timed that answers to letters can be received with perfect regularity, and with the utmost possible despatch. On the arrival of the European steamer at Havana, all the mails which had been sent from North America are there received. Two steamers immediately start from the Havana; one proceeds to New Orleans with the outward mail. Thence she goes to Tampico and Vera Cruz, and taking in the return mail, proceeds back to Havana. The other leaves Havana for Vera Cruz, and from Tampico with the outward mails, and from the latter place to New Orleans where she takes up all the return mails, and carries them to Havana where she arrives at the same time with the other steamer, and where a steamer is ready to start to bear the whole to the connecting point of Nassau, when the mails proceed northward to North America, eastward to Europe, and southward to the West Indies. It will be readily perceived that by this arrangement abundance of time is afforded in every place for replies to letters.

We have conversed with the commissioner who has been appointed by the company and the government to make the necessary preparations for commencing this extended service. He informs us that every government and the authorities of every colony, British and foreign, from Surinam to the Mississippi, have most readily and cheerfully acquiesced in the views and wishes of the British government and company, by agreeing to counter the steamers as national vessels, to be consequently exempt from all port charges and custom house dues and regulations; and in permitting them to arrive and depart, land and receive mails, passengers and specie at all the ports.

The agent has politely furnished us with the names of the gentlemen comprising the direction of the company. They are the following: John Irving, M. P. chairman, Andrew Colville, vice chairman, Thomas Cairns, Thomas Baring, Henry David, son of P. Maxwell Stewart, John Irving, jun. Robert Catesworth, William Marshall, George Brown, Russell Elliot and George Hilbert.

Such are the outlines of the British project for monopolizing intercourse along our north Atlantic waters, in addition to that already established by Cunard's line.

One other extract, bearing upon the subject before us, must suffice for the present. It is from a letter which we find in the National Intelligencer, and has relation to similar projects even the western coast of this continent and throughout the great Pacific ocean.

Tulacumna, March 20, 1841.

MY DEAR SIR: As you did me the honor to ask me to write to you, I avail myself of the present opportunity to do so; and as you have always manifested so much interest in my plans, I will relate to you some account of my success since my arrival in the Pacific.

The first steamers, the "Pera" and "Cithi," of 700 tons and nearly 200 horse power, reached this port after a voyage of 55 days at sea from London, passing through the straits of Magellan, and occupying thirty hours from sea to sea, affording thereby another proof of the victorious power of steam. Although encountering at times adverse weather, not the slightest accident occurred to either ship or machinery. The combination of steaming and sailing has been beautifully demonstrated, and the sailing ships under canvass alone, with merely a section of the paddle floats taken off, was fully equal to the fastest ships.

Our steam operations commenced here under the most brilliant auspices. Nothing could exceed the interest manifested by the inhabitants. I first commenced on a line of coast of fourteen hundred and fifty miles, embracing no less than eleven ports of importance, including Lima and Valparaiso. Such were the facilities afforded by the millions of the south, that, in this coast, the ease in which the ports were entered, that so accomplished the voyage in its full extent within two or three hours, and to the minor and nearer ports in a less period. Perhaps no part of the world has been so well supplied with steam, offers such decided advantages for "steam" as this, and certainly no part of the world requires it more: voyages which were usually of twenty to thirty days are accomplished by the steamers in forty hours, and voyages of fifteen days are reduced to twenty-four hours.

As proper measures were not taken to secure a supply of coal from England, I have been obliged to stop until such supplies were forthcoming. Encouraged by the hope of meeting the millions of the south, I adapted to steam purposes. I explored the country as far as Chiloe, where I found coal, but that which offered most advantage was in the bay of Talcahuano; no mines had hitherto been worked, but several cargoes had been taken superficially; here I commenced my labors. Without practical knowledge or the aid of science, I have opened no less than seven mines—have found the material necessary for our purposes, and am now engaged taking out about fourteen tons per day at an expense of about one dollar per ton. I have found the steamer, its quality is in the proportion of sixteen tons to thirteen tons of English coal. I am now in hopes of finding another and lower stratum, and with this view I am sinking two shafts which give strong indications of better coal. If I succeed, I feel confident that I shall find coal fully equal to New Castle, if we draw a comparison between the first and second stratum, and that the quantity will be sufficient to supply all the steamers which may be required on this coast for any period. This discovery of steam coal will, perhaps, be considered one of the most important events in the history of this country. It is rather a singular coincidence that the coal discovered both on the eastern and western sides of the isthmus of Panama is of precisely the same character as the coal of Talcahuano. I have sent to the isthmus for some tons of this coal, and hope yet to derive our supplies from that source, so far as may be required for that portion of our steam service.

The line of steam communication I propose to extend immediately as far as Guayaquil, and for the present the intercourse from there will be by means of sailing packets once in twenty days.

As the line of commerce of the Pacific will, soon commenced to Australia. I feel the greatest anxiety to see this intercourse established. For America I consider it as one of the most important points; it will make her the stepping stone between Europe and the Eastern Archipelago. The Australian colonies of England will assume a position novel and of infinite value to them progress in civilization; the Anglo-Saxon race will occupy nearly all the vast inhabitable space embraced in their widely extended borders, and the tide of intercourse will run from the shores of Japan and China to be poured in the same position as it regards our western shores of the Pacific as Europe occupies as it regards our Atlantic states.

In considering the establishment of steam navigation in the Pacific as the pioneer of these great events, the barrier that divides the two seas or oceans will soon disappear. I have ocular evidence that the junction can be effected with infinitely less difficulty than is imagined. I passed over the Isthmus on the 10th inst. to this country with a vessel of the tonnage of forty feet, and a distance of twenty-eight miles. This is but a barrier of straw when compared to the vast results which will be produced. I sincerely hope that one of the first acts of the government will be to investigate this, to us more than to any other nation in the world, all important matter. Our steamers cannot but look forward to the period when our worn ironies will reach the Pacific, and when the population of the U. States reaches that coast, of what infinite value will a water communication through the isthmus of Panama be to us. It may perhaps be thought too speculative to indulge in such views; but when I reflect that twenty years only, the time which I resided on this coast, has witnessed one of the most important political and commercial revolutions which has ever taken place, I cannot but view the period of these great changes to which I have referred, as much nearer than we imagine.

DUTIES ON AMERICAN TOBACCO BY THE GERMAN STATES.

It appears from the correspondence called for by the senate, between the American minister at Berlin, and the authorities of the Prussian government, that no modification of the existing duties levied on American tobacco in the German states of the custom union is likely immediately to take place.—The present duty on our tobacco is enormously high, being $3.25 on the importation of the duty of reducing this duty was strongly urged by our minister and agent. "What we demanded," says Mr. Wheaton, "was, such a general reduction of the duty on the importation of all foreign unmanufactured tobacco into the country of the Germanic confederation of commerce and customs, as would have the incidental effect of counteracting the unfavorable operation of the present duty on tobacco in leaves and stems produced in the United States, in comparison with its operation upon the tobacco of the colonies of leaf tobacco, imported from the Spanish colonies, and the South American states. It was upon the same grounds, that we had proposed a discrimination between leaves and stems." Mr. Kuhlmeier, director general of the Prussian customs, admitted that he should have no hesitation, if called upon to give it as his opinion, considering the question in a financial point of view, that a considerable reduction of the present duty on foreign raw tobaccos might be made, without any injury to the revenues of the association.

Mr. Wheaton adds: "Mr. Kuhlmeier concluded the conversation by remarking, that no change would be made in the existing tariff of the association during the present year, (under the present tariff, the duty on tobacco, with foreign ports), the tariff being already settled for the years 1840, 1841 and 1842; and the general triennial revision being to take place at the next congress, which is to meet at Stuttgart, the capital of the kingdom of Wurtemberg, in June, 1842. He had, however, ascertained, during the present session of congress at Berlin, that the commissioners from the southern states of Germany, supposed to be most interested in the cultivation of the native plant, had no insuperable objections to a reduction of the duty, if it could be shown that it would be attended with an increase of revenue, and especially if it could be anticipated that equivalent advantages would be thereby obtained for their products and manufactures, in the transatlantic trade. The foreign tobacco, he said, was principally required by these states to mix with the native, and they would be willing to take a larger quantity of North American, as it would not injure the cultivation of the native plant."

In a letter by Mr. Dodge to Mr. Wheaton the following comparison of duties is made:

In the Zollverein, the duty is $3.25 per 100 lbs.

REPORT ON A HOME SQUADRON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 7, 1841.
Mr. Thomas Butler King, from the committee on naval affairs, to whom the subject had been referred, submitted the following report: Resolved—

"The committee on naval affairs, to whom was referred so much of the president's message and accompanying documents as relates to the navy, acknowledge to report on the expediency of providing for the support of a home squadron, as recommended in the report of the secretary of the navy."

The change which the introduction of steam power has already effected and is constantly producing in the naval armaments of the maritime powers of Europe, evidently require the most prompt and efficient action on the part of the government of the United States, to meet this new and powerful auxiliary in naval warfare, by so changing the construction and employment of our navy as most effectually to protect our commerce and guard our sea coast against the sudden approach of an enemy employing this new and formidable description of force; and it is the opinion of the committee that no measure is more imperiously demanded by every consideration of prudence and safety than that recommended in the report of the secretary—the employment of a home squadron, composed of a pair of armed steamers. He very justly remarks, that "Had a war with Great Britain been the result, as at one time was generally feared, of the subjects of difficulty now in course of adjustment between that power and the United States, not only would our trade have been liable to great interruption, and our merchants to great losses abroad, but a naval force, comparatively small, might, on our very shores, have seized our merchant ships and insulted our flag, without suitable means of resistance or immediate retaliation being at the command of the government. To guard against such a result—to be ever ready to repel or promptly to chastise aggression upon our own shores, it is necessary that a powerful squadron should be kept afloat at home. This measure is recommended by other considerations. There is no situation in which greater skill or seamanship can be exercised and acquired than on the coast of the United States; and in no service would our officers and seamen become more thoroughly initiated in all that is necessary for the national defence and glory. In that service, aided by the coast survey now in progress, a thorough acquaintance would be gained with our own sea coast, extensive and hitherto but imperfectly known; the various ports would be visited; the bays, inlets, and harbors carefully examined; the uses to which each could be made available during war, either for escape, defence or annoyance, be ascertained; and the confidence resulting from perfect knowledge would give us, what we ought surely to possess, a decided advantage over an enemy on our own shores."

In addition to the excellent and comprehensive view presented by the secretary, the committee beg leave to submit a few observations in regard to the present state of our sea coast defence, their efficiency in case of war, and the measures now being adopted by Great Britain and France to change their naval armaments from the common vessels of war to armed steamers. It is a fact almost too notorious for remark here, that our fortifications are in a most inefficient condition. Many of those that have been completed are not supplied with cannon, others are going rapidly to decay—some are unfinished and progressing so slowly that it will require many years to complete them; none of them are properly garrisoned, and some have not a man to keep the gates closed. These fortresses have cost immense sums of money, and if well supplied with guns and garrisons would afford but partial protection to a few points on our sea coast and to our armed squadrons in time of war. They could not defend us against the armed steamers of an enemy, which might pass them in the night, or avoid them by entering harbors where there are no fortifications.—This last remark is peculiarly applicable to the southern coast, where there are numerous harbors on the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and not a fort, from Charleston to Mobile, in a condition to fire a gun. In the event of a war with France or Great Britain, the fortifications at Pensacola, and perhaps others, might be seized and held by the enemy, or any of our unprotected harbors might be entered by fleets of armed steamers loaded with black troops from the West Indies to annoy and plunder the country. The northern portion of the Atlantic coast, where such vast sums have been expended to place it in a state of defence, would by no means be secure against the rapid movements of such an enemy. The harbor of New York itself might be entered through the Inlet at Amboy and Staten Island Sound, and the fortifications at the Narrows entirely avoided. The city might be sacked or laid under contribution before a sufficient force could be collected to prevent the approach or escape of so formidable an enemy; and it is seriously to be feared that there is not a harbor on the whole coast, however well defended against the sailing ships of an enemy, that these steamers might not enter, by avoiding the forts or passing them in the night.

If this is true, it must be perceived that not only our commerce, but our cities with all their wealth, would be at the mercy of an enemy employing a force so rapid and certain in its movements. It, therefore, becomes a question of the most urgent and vital importance to the people and government of the United States how they can soonest and best provide the means of meeting this new and powerful auxiliary in maritime war. The employment of a home squadron, as recommended by the secretary of the navy, must be justly regarded as not only the best means of meeting any sudden emergency that may arise, but of leading to such ulterior measures as may be found necessary to give to our commerce and seacoast the greatest possible security.

As connecting itself immediately with this subject and calling for the most vigilant course of policy on the part of the government of the United States, the committee beg leave to call the attention of the house to the measures now being adopted by Great Britain to keep afloat and actively employed on our northern coast and in the West Indies a large number of steamers of the largest class; many of them with their guns on board, and the others at all times ready to receive them.

Some time since a contract was made with that government by Mr. Cunard and his associate to carry the royal mail from Liverpool to Halifax for the sum of sixty thousand pounds sterling, or $391,000 per annum. In compliance with this contract, four steamers have been constructed and placed on the line, of twelve hundred tons burthen and 450 horse power each. These vessels leave Liverpool and Halifax every fortnight, and perform the trip across the Atlantic each way with great certainty in twelve days. These steamers are commanded by officers of the royal navy, and are so at all times subject to the orders of the British government. So great have been not only the facilities afforded to commerce and intercourse, but saving to the revenue in the cost of carrying the mail, that it is now proposed to double the number of steamers, that they may leave their respective ports every week instead of every fortnight. The London Journal of Commerce says:—"under the old packet system, between Falmouth and Halifax, by the gun brig, the expense to government was about forty thousand pounds sterling annually more than the receipts of postage. By the line of Cunard's steam ships, a balance of twenty thousand pounds appears already to the credit side of the Atlantic mails." This line has been extended to Boston.

On the 20th March, 1840, a contract was entered into between the commissioners of the admiralty and "the royal mail steam packet company," for conveying "all her majesty's mails" from such port in the British channel as the commissioners shall prescribe, to the West India islands, the coast of South America, Mexico, and the United States, touching and delivering the mails at the ports specified on the various annexed to this report, on which are traced the various lines of communication to be established in pursuance of the contract. The company is bound to "provide, maintain, keep seaworthy, and in complete repair and readiness," for the purpose of conveying the mails, "a sufficient number—not less than fourteen—of good, substantial, and efficient steam vessels, of such construction and strength as to be fit and able to carry guns of the largest calibre now used on board of her majesty's steam vessels of war" to adopt from time to time, and at all times, such changes or improvements in construction, machinery, armament, and rigging, as the commissioners may require; to carry a certain number of government officers and men, at a stipulated price, and at all times to hold their vessels subject to the orders of such officers as may be placed on board to assume command. This company is to receive two hundred and forty thousand pounds sterling per annum, which may, in certain events, be increased to three hundred and ten thousand, or to $1,368,800.

These steamers are all in rapid progress of construction. They are to be about 1,500 tons burthen, and to receive engines of 500 horse power each.—Those that have been launched are estimated to be in all respects equal to sixty-gun frigates. "Thus," it is said, "the country will be doubly served; and, while it pays to the mail company, 240,000 pounds per annum for the transport of the mails, it will defray, by the same payment, the annual charges of the largest and most powerful steam fleet in the world, fully armed with the heaviest ordnance, to act as war-frigates when required by the government for that purpose." To which may, at any time, be added the steamers employed in Cunard's line, and those running from London and Bristol to New York. It is also said to be in contemplation to establish another line from some port in England to St. John's, New Brunswick, under a contract similar to that made with the royal mail steam packet company.

All these lines will soon be in full operation and employ at least twenty-five, and perhaps thirty steamers of the largest class and most approved construction; those on the southern line, and probably those on the northern lines also, having their guns on board. These steamers are to be commanded by officers of the royal navy, and to carry such number of officers and men as the government, under certain regulations, may require, who will thus derive all the necessary instruction to enable them to command and manage vessels of this description. Of the fourteen designed to carry the West India mails, at least ten will be constantly employed in conveying them on the various lines as traced on the map here annexed; it will be seen by reference to it that this formidable fleet will be at all times within three or four days' run of our southern coast. In the event of a declaration of war by Great Britain against the United States, as the will, of course, possess the information necessary to enable her to concentrate her forces, all the steamers in the West India mail service can be collected at any point on the southern coast by the time the declaration would be communicated to the president. Those employed on the northern lines to New York and Boston, may commence hostilities before the last preparation can be made to meet them. Depots of coal are to be established at Halifax, and at several ports in the West Indies, from whence these fleets can be supplied and the prediction made some years since by an intelligent and experienced British officer, that their sailing ships of war would become coal carriers to their steamers, will be fulfilled.

There are, it is said, at this time, ten thousand black troops in the British West Indies, and that orders have been recently issued to increase the number to twenty-five thousand. These troops are disciplined and commanded by white officers, and, no doubt, designed to form a most important portion of the force to be employed in any future contest that may arise between Great Britain and the United States; and, by reference to the map of the West India mail lines, it will be seen that in our present defenceless condition, a force composed of armed steamers and troops of that description would not only give great annoyance to our coast, but most effectually and at once put a stop to all communication around Cape Florida, or through the passage of the West Indies, to or from the Gulf of Mexico, and, consequently, the commerce of the great valley of the Mississippi must fall into the hands of the enemy, or its vast productions, cut off from market, be rendered valueless.

France is pursuing a course of policy in every respect similar to that of Great Britain. The last official register of her navy shows that she then had thirty seven armed steamers, carrying heavy guns, equal in all respects, if not superior, to those of any other nation. The sudden appearance of one of them some two years ago, in the harbour of Baltimore, must be recollected by all. A law has recently been enacted authorizing the government to establish a line of armed steamers from Havre to New York, on the plan of the British West India mail line; and, surprising as it may seem, a number of gentlemen of position have actually sent in proposals to take the contract, if that city instead of New-York shall be inserted in it. Thus it will be perceived that our own merchants, driven by the laws of trade and intercourse, are about throwing the whole weight of their skill, enterprise, and capital into the hands of one of our great maritime rivals, for want of proper action and encouragement on the part of their own government, and that the humiliating spectacle is likely to be presented of American merchants, who have excelled all others in commercial pursuits, being employed to support a naval force that may be directed against the cities in which they reside.

Under the old system of maritime war, our squadrons could be employed in the protection of our commerce and our flag abroad, without danger of aggression on our own coast, because the fleets of an enemy could no sooner approach to assail than our own return to defend us. But the introduction of steam power has affected such astonishing changes, that armaments on the most extensive scale are no longer to be considered as alone suited to the purposes of war, but the most formidable vessels the world has ever seen to be employed in the transportation of the mail, passengers and freight, to pass along the whole line of our coast, and into our ports, as familiarly as common trading ships. If these vessels can be rendered profitable in time of peace, the security they will afford to persons and property, from the attacks of privateers and small armed vessels, will render them indispensable in time of war.

This system is yet in its infancy; and it is not in the power of the committee to say, with any degree of accuracy, how far it may be rendered useful to our commerce, or profitably connected with our navy; to what extent it may be made to support itself, or the policy of other governments, and a proper regard for our own safety, may render its adoption wise or necessary. These are questions of the utmost importance to all portions of this widely extended country, and ought to be promptly and properly inquired into, and satisfactorily answered.

A gentleman of great respectability and much experience in commercial affairs, and particularly in steam navigation, has given it as his opinion that "contracts could be made immediately for lines of four steamers from Boston to Havre, of four from New York to Liverpool, of three from Norfolk, via Charleston and Savannah, to Havana, and of three from New Orleans to Havana, by the guaranty of the government of less than one million of dollars per annum, with a moral certainty of receiving back more than half of it, from postage on letters and papers, immediately, and the whole in a few years." This arrangement would keep equipped and officered for immediate service at least fourteen steam frigates, without the annual charge for repairs, manning, victualling, &c. &c. This system would bring to the aid of the government all the energy, skill, and economy of individuals who will, in enterprises of this nature, always surpass it.

From what has been stated, it must, in the opinion of the committee, be perceived that a powerful squadron has become as necessary for our protection at home as the employment of our ships of war has hitherto been, or may hereafter be, for the protection of our flag and commerce abroad. This squadron ought at once to be established, and from time to time increased, as the means placed at command of the department may permit, and the various objects connected with it, as pointed out in the report of the secretary, may best be promoted and attained.

For this purpose, the committee report herewith a bill appropriating the amount asked for by the secretary, and recommending the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy is hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of aiding individuals or companies in the establishment of lines of armed steamers between some of our principal northern and southern ports, and to foreign ports; to advertise for proposals for the establishment of such lines as he may deem most important and practicable; and to report to this house at the next session of congress.

The following remarks made by Mr. KNOX, of Georgia, when the bill making appropriations for a home squadron was under discussion in the house of representatives, will be read with much interest:

Mr. K. said he had no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina as to the objects of the appropriation being more specific, and, at the proper time, should an amendment be moved to that effect, he would vote for it. In reply to what that gentleman had said touching the power of congress to create a home squadron to be retained upon our own coast, the gentleman seemed to forget his own doctrine of specific appropriations. Congress gave this money; they would give it for a specific object, and if they did, the president, though he was commander-in-chief, could not apply it to any thing else. The gentleman said the bill was, really, for an increase of the navy. So it was; he admitted it was so designed to be, and he hoped to show that the navy might be thus increased without increasing the ordinary average in past years for naval purposes. The reasons for the proposed increase had been stated in the report of the secretary, and were familiar to the mind of every gentleman. Mr. K. would, therefore, not recapitulate them. He was assured from the authentic return he had showing what had been done in past years by way of appropriation, and what had been the comparative results in different years. He would not trouble the house by reading the whole, but would invite their attention to three or four items only.

In 1836 there was appropriated $7,611,055 and we had 462 guns afloat.

In 1837 there was appropriated $9,183,710 and we had 554 guns afloat.

In 1838 there was appropriated $5,702,420 and we had 639 guns afloat.

In 1839 there was appropriated $5,364,385 and we had 606 guns afloat.

In 1840 there was appropriated $5,155,120 and we had 583 guns afloat.

In 1841 there was appropriated $5,780,927.

The present bill increased this by $789,310; besides which there were other bills reported, which made together an appropriation of $1,553,916 for this session, and going to make up a grand aggregate of $7,333,943 for the year; which was less, by a million and a half, than what was appropriated in 1836.

It was proposed to add 107 more guns to the service, making the whole number 1,070 afloat after the current year, instead of 462, which was the number in 1836.

[These statistics are reported by the year alone, and may not in every case be strictly correct.]

Mr. K. said he had gone into this comparative statement to show that the committee on naval affairs had not transcended the amount which in former years had been deemed reasonable and proper, although the country had had but half the number of ships in the service, or of guns afloat, which it would have during the present year.

Mr. K. had heard much about the abuse and misapplication of money appropriated for the navy, and he believed it all to be true. To illustrate the truth of the charge, he would refer to the table already quoted, showing on one hand the appropriations made, and on the other the result thereby obtained. In 1830 there had been an appropriation of $4,704,149, and we had then 376 guns afloat; while in 1836, with an appropriation of $7,611,055, we had but 462 guns afloat. In 1861, with an appropriation of a little over three millions, we had 536 guns afloat; and in 1838, with an appropriation over eight millions, we had but 554 guns afloat. These facts were sufficient to show how enormous must have been the abuse to which he alluded. He trusted that now the time was come, and the men, come with it, in which economy, knowledge, integrity and a devoted zeal for the public service, if they did not curtail the actual amount expended, would to apply the same money as when he conversed with a far greater extension of the naval defenses of the country than had been witnessed for many years. Mr. K. was no niggard in regard to the navy. He would have been willing to give a much larger sum could it have been secured, for he served actively with the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) that, instead of two war steamers, it was desirable that we should have twenty. The ocean was teeming with these mighty engines, rapidly passing each other in every direction, going wherever they pleased, in disregard of wind and waves, and which had appropriately been denominated the "cavalry of the ocean, mounted with cannon."

Mr. K. here went into a comparison of the population of this country at two different periods, and at the same time of the amount of tonnage and the guns to defend it.

In 1800 with a population of 5,305,000 and an amount of tonnage of 100,000 registered tonnage, we had 876 guns afloat; in 1841 our population was 17,000,000, our tonnage 2,960,000, and yet our guns were but 1,070. This showed how far our naval force was from keeping up with the growth of the population and the commerce of the country, and that the same ratio of defence at this day which had existed in 1800, we should require 2,000 guns afloat and an appropriation of over seven millions.

Mr. K. observed that although the importance of a home squadron had been very clearly set forth in the report of the secretary of the navy, there were some other considerations which could not but still more strongly impress it upon the mind. He here forcibly referred to the devastations of the enemy's force in the Chesapeake and on the exposed coasts of Georgia and South Carolina; their country had been plundered; their dwellings burnt; their property stolen; and had the contest continued, nothing but one extended scene of desolation would have spread from the Potomac to the Sabine.

The war had cost the country from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of dollars; and did any gentleman suppose that, had the United States possessed twenty ships of war well armed and fully manned, their outrages on our commerce could ever have happened which gave the occasion for so destructive a conflict? No man would maintain it. For it must be remembered that with nations war was a question of power, and with us a question of honor. Questions of policy and questions of honor could easily be negotiated away, as all history abundantly proved; but when policy and interest decided war, the blunder of this country's cannon was generally the first announcement that hostilities were commenced, and then a long array of reasons was gotten up as a pretext for the blow.

Mr. K. here referred to and read an extract from the Richmond Enquirer, which sounded the tocsin of alarm by announcing that a British vessel called the Thunder was at this time engaged in arraying the channel of the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, and was about proceeding to the southwest for the purpose of attacking the defenses of the harbor of facilitating the entrance of a British fleet into our harbors. He then said the object of a home squadron was to prevent the completion of such a purpose. He expressed his great surprise at the remarks of some gentlemen, who seemed to suppose that the invention of rail roads, by facilitating the assembling of troops, superseded the necessity both of fortifications and of a navy. Instead of this, these several modes of defence ought to go hand in hand, and be combined for the general end of the safety of the country.

Mr. K. alluded to the change which had manifested itself in the naval policy of Great Britain, in regard to a substitution of steam power for ordinary ships of war. He stated the enumeration of the British fleet in 1840 to be as follows: ships of the line, 105; vessels of a lower grade, in all, 403; and war steamers, 87. The number of steamers had since then been stated at 300.

The French Republic consisted of 23 ships of the line, 160 lesser vessels, and 36 steamers; but which there had been at that time eight steamers on the stocks. These vessels propelled by steam arose at Athens in fourteen days. It would be well if we copied the courage and property of our people, if we a force of this description, without a gun to defend themselves?

But not only was it an availed of for vessels of war, properly so-called. The governments of France and England were adopting an entirely new policy, by employing armed cruisers for commercial purposes—thus causing the sagacity and enterprise of the mercantile community to support the expense of their naval defence—a great and wonderful step in the preparations for maritime warfare.

Appended to the report of the naval committee would be found, in reference to these very important facts, a resolution inquiring into the expediency of encouraging our own merchants to establish lines of armed steamers similar to the recently established by France and England. In addition to the lines previously existing, a new one had recently been formed, on a contract with the Brazilian government, extending from Great Britain to every important port in Brazil. These various lines had been multiplied till they now resembled a perfect web across the ocean. Mr. K. had no apprehension that that formidable and sagacious power had any intention of immediate war with this country; it would not prevent suit her policy. It was also a grand and a surely sifting bar whole system. She desired above all things to emancipate herself from the necessity of depending on any of our products for carrying on those manufactures which were the great sources of her wealth. Hence, while she had emancipated her slaves in the West Indies, she still retained millions in slavery in India, and was endeavoring to avail herself of their industry for a supply of raw material now obtained from this country. She looked with great just apprehension to the rapid growth and extending commerce of this country.

Mr. K. here made some remarks on British emancipation, which he considered but as one step in this great scheme of the national policy. He alluded to the recent great increase of the slave trade. Two hundred thousand were now said to be annually imported into the West Indies and South America per annum; almost the whole of which were purchased with British manufactures. While this was the case, how great a force was it for her to offer a guinea a head for negroes captured on the high seas! If she was sincere in her wish to put an end to the trade, why did she enter the harbor, and break up the factories on shore? But, no, she suffered the slaves to be purchased with her manufactures, embarked on the ocean, and then offered to pay her own officers a guinea a head for catching them if they could. When they were rescued and brought into her own islands, they were put to an apprenticeship of fourteen years.

[Here the CHAIR reminded Mr. K. that he was wandering from the subject before the committee.] Mr. K. explained and then went on to observe that the moment Great Britain could supply herself elsewhere with a raw material for her manufactures, she might export war—war to the knife—war with all her thunder. After dilating further on the grand game now playing by that country, Mr. K. asked whether this government would be content to sleep in reckless security under such a state of things, and never take a step to meet and counteract a system of policy which was aimed at our prosperity, and, if possible, at the very existence of our republican institutions? Would we wait till she came upon us like a thief in the night? Did gentlemen forget that the last of the wars in Europe at least ten had been commenced without any formal declaration? No; England would not send us word she was coming. The thunder of her cannon would be the voice in which she would speak the purpose of her heart to the world.

Mr. K. said, in conclusion, that he would not weary the committee by deprecating upon the provisions of the bill. He hoped it would receive a general support, and that we should show the world not only that we are ready and prompt in using the means necessary for our defence, but equally wise and economical in their appropriation.

REPORT UPON A BANKRUPT LAW.

The following report, from the committee on the judiciary, accompanied the bill reported by Mr. BARNARD in the house of representatives on Wednesday last, for establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy.

The committee on the judiciary, to whom have been referred the petitions and memorials presented to the house on the subject of a bankrupt law, respectfully report:

In the opinion of the committee, a bankrupt law ought to be passed by congress without unnecessary delay; and they present a bill for the consideration of the house.

This bill is essentially the same that was introduced to the senate at the first session of the last congress, after great deliberation, and which finally passed that body. It was not then considered in the house for want of time.

The policy of laws designed to afford remedy and relief to our creditors and their debtors who are hopelessly insolvent, has the sanction of usage, in the past and the present, among nearly all highly civilized and business communities. The leading idea upon which these laws have proceeded has certainly always been the same; it has varied with the general state of the law, and with the progress of society. In a country where the creditor was, by law, the undisturbed abettor of liberty and life in his insolvent debtor, the immediate motive for intervention must have been different from that which has prompted legislative interference where the relation of debtor and creditor has been differently understood.

In England, bankrupt laws had their origin apparently in the idea that debtors who did not pay were merely unwilling, and not unable to pay. The first bankrupt law passed in the time of Henry 8th was levelled against those who craftily obtained the goods of other men and fled; or kept their houses, and refused to pay their debts. It came in aid of the law, previously in existence, which rendered the unwillingness, which authorized imprisonment for debt—a thing unknown to the common law. If a debt was not paid, the creditor itself was supposed to have been craftily obtained; the ability to pay was presumed. The debtor was arrested and imprisoned, till he should be made willing; or, if he had fled or kept house, so that arrest was impossible, his estate passed into the custody of the law for the liquidation of his debts.

So long as this idea of ability and unwillingness prevailed, and no other was admitted, the whole evil, so far as creditors were considered, was supposed to be adequately met by the punishment of imprisonment or confiscation. When, however, it was found, as industry and production came to be increased by the use of capital and credit, that the mass of debtors who did not pay were only unable but not unwilling, it became necessary to turn round, and, without disarming the creditor, throw a shield over the defenceless head of his honest and innocent debtor.

The law in England on this subject, often variously modified in matters of detail, now is, and has long been, in substance:

And second, that where creditors invoke the punishment of imprisonment on their debtor, the latter, if willing but unable to pay, may regain his freedom upon a voluntary and honest surrender of his property, to be applied towards liquidation.

And third, that where debtors invoke the punishment of confiscation on their debtor, which can only be done where the debtor belongs to one or another of certain specified classes, the creditors shall take the full benefit of the proceedings by the application of the property towards the payment of their debts; provided the debtor, being honest and willing but unable to pay in full, shall, on certain terms and conditions, be forever discharged from all legal obligation to pay the rest and residue of his debts.

Thus the law of interposition and relief, in England, as between creditors on the one hand, and debtors who cannot pay their debts on the other, stands, and is administered, in two distinct branches and under two distinct systems. In the one system the debtors are divided into two classes, the one of which are called bankrupts. In a report made to the queen, in July, 1810, and signed by eight out of nine commissioners appointed to investigate this subject, it was strongly recommended to reduce the two branches of the law and system to one administration to one consistent system, and make the whole law of the case more conformable to reason and in right.

The principal improvements in the law relating to insolvency proposed by the commissioners are these:

To extend the benefits of the discharge from debts, in case of bankruptcy, beyond the mercantile and other specified classes, to which they are now chiefly confined, so as to embrace "all persons engaged in business requiring capital and credit."

To allow and encourage a voluntary cession of property, on the part of insolvents, "at such period of their affliction as will best ensure equal justice to all their creditors."

To make the granting of a certificate of discharge a judicial act, which may be opposed by creditors if the debtor, to which their consent shall not be necessary.

The suggestion of these improvements is sufficient to indicate the great change which public sentiment has undergone, or is undergoing, in England, in regard to the proper basis on which those laws ought to rest that interpose their special authority between creditors and their insolvent debtors.

At this day, and in this country, if a system of laws relating to bankruptcies is to be established, it is believed that it is not sufficient to preserve and state the grounds on which it ought to stand.

Credits, or demands, are property, in which, not infrequently, the bulk of large individual estates consists. As property, they are under the protection of the law, as well as such as the law of property. All the rights of property attach to them—the right of protection and defence against all encroachment and injury, and the right of recovery when wrongfully taken away, or withheld. They are private property, and private property is sacred. It must be respected. And the law must be vigilant and efficient in its guardianship of it. Failure in this is failure in the highest duty of civil society, and tends directly to discord.

But the nature of credits, or demands, is such as to constitute them a peculiar species of property; and, before we can undertake to pronounce with certainty on the whole duty of society and the law in regard to them, we must consider attentively their nature and peculiarities.

They are a peculiar tenure—a tenure which implies and includes a contingency. The foundation of loan is trust, whatever securities are not taken; it is confidence; it is credit—all terms which imply trust, and the possibility of failure. The risk relative to the loan is upon the lender, and the lender when the period comes for demanding payment.—This kind of property is held subject to this contingency, and the lender himself takes the risk; he is his own insurer. If his debtor fails, he loses; if not, he has his own. He bargains, too, for this risk, in the shape of interest, premium, or commission. He parts with the immediate possession of his property, expecting it to come back to him, in paper time, with increase; he puts it afloat, and takes the hazards of the voyage for a consideration. If, when the time of the turbulent sea, he expects to sustain the loss.—He is content to hold his property subject to this contingency.

While his debtor remains solvent, which is always to be presumed until the contrary appears, the duty of society and the law towards him and this property of his is plain enough. If he invoke the law in the case, it will come efficiently to his aid. If his debtor attempt to elude his demand by flight or fraud, it will be his duty to pursue him to the very death; and, otherwise, it will seize the unwilling debtor's estate and make the debt out of it for the creditor. When the law by these means has aided the creditor in the recovery of his property it has done all it duty as well as his solvent debtor.

But suppose, before such recovery is had, the debtor is found to have fallen into a state of hopeless insolvency; in other words, that contingency has arisen; subject to which the demand has been hidden from its inception. What course can a new duty has arisen on the part of the law.

The fact of insolvency being ascertained, the fact of utter and hopeless inability to pay all his debts, the debtor stands at once creditor, if in a new relation, at least in a relation materially modified. His creditors, taken together, now form a class, looking for a common relief to a common fund, which is insufficient to satisfy them all; and every principle of equity and justice requires that the law should interpose in give and take, which distribute the loss, in proportion to the relative amount of his demand, at the same time casting on each an amount of loss proportioned to the risk and insolvency undertaken by him.

When this is done, the inquiry arises, what more remains in the law to be done? What further, and can the creditors demand? They cannot have the body of their debtor cut up and divided between them, as was said might have been done under the law of the twelve tables, or sell him with his wife and child in slavery to pay their debts. They cannot at this day and in this country load him with chains, inflict stripes upon him, or throw him into a perpetual prison. Within, in this country, it may be considered as wholly settled, by a wise and humane public sentiment and policy, that the law will pursue, and will permit creditors to pursue, an honest but unfortunately and hopelessly insolvent debtor no further, after what remains of his wrecked fortune has been equitably divided amongst those to whom he is indebted.

Beyond this the law sees and wisely adjusts that there is an end of all reasonable hope of further advantage to creditors. A form of insolubleness still remains, but the substance is gone. Nothing is left to the debtor with which to recover himself but his hands. He is no longer a man, but a wreck. It is not profitable, according to his skill or his habits, but in no regular employment will or can the wages of labor afford more than a current support to the laborer and those dependent on him, so long as he is not who were in favor of protection; and who they were that were in favor of counteracting the action of foreign governments against the native industry of our own people.

Mr. A. has adhered to the recent proceedings in the British parliament in relation to free trade and the corn laws, and to the defeat which the British ministry had sustained there. He hoped that, before the American nation undertook to act upon such a system, they would have something more before them than the testimony of the British parliament. Let the British government set the example of free trade, and it would then be time enough for us to meet them in that spirit.

He hoped the printing would be agreed to; and he wished it was the point of the meeting to reconsider the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FORTNACE) had been thrown out of the power of this house. He hoped the subject would be considered at this session even if there should be no action upon it until the next. He was for coming to an issue upon it at once.

He hoped also that the other gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDEACE) would bring forward the resolution to which he referred. But let not the gentleman move in reference to the committee of ways and means. There was too much compromise in that committee. He hoped the gentleman would move its reference to the committee on manufactures. But let us not commit the labor to the wolf—open our commerce to him.

Mr. PICKENS could have no objection, he said, to the printing of the memorial if that were the only question. But as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) chose to make the printing a question, and asked before a protective tariff, and asked them to combine and come together with a united action because those opposed to them were acting upon one principle. He (Mr. P.) regretted that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) was not in his seat to hear some of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to listen to his billing and cooing to the Pennsylvania delegation upon this floor. Had the gentleman from Virginia been here, he might perhaps have been induced to believe that his charge to a coalition between Kentucky and Massachusetts was true. Probably he might have gone against other compromises and other conditions, not with Kentucky, but with the Pennsylvania delegation. Mr. P. protested against all such bargains and coalitions, and was understood to speak upon Kentucky not to sustain any such bargains, but to sustain the spirit and the principles of the compromise act.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has said it would be consulting a bull if sent to the committee of ways and means, like sending a lamb to the wolf. He (Mr. P.) repelled the insinuation if intended to apply to him or his friends. When he says there is too much compromise on that committee for him, who does the gentleman allude to? He cannot say he (Mr. P.) was for compromising. No; he would find in him no compromise. His course was open and without compromise upon great principles. He must allude to others upon that committee, and let them answer for themselves. He said that the gentleman had alluded to upon that committee or in this house, he would say to the gentleman that he hoped the time would yet come when that under-current, which was now seen to ripple, would swell and roll upon us like the great waves of state bounding upon it, with as gallant a crew on board as ever shouted for victory under the flag of liberty and independence.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he felt it his duty to say a few words in reply to what had fallen from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS), who seemed disposed to ring the changes once more on the subject of the British corn laws, and to marshal his battalions under the banner of a protective tariff. He had called out the interests of the west, and made an appeal particularly to the great state of Pennsylvania to come to the rescue of the manufacturing interests of the northeast. I propose (said Mr. K.) to examine briefly the effect of the British corn laws on the grain growing and manufacturing interests of this country. The effect in the first place is, to raise enormously the price of bread, and consequently the price of labor in England. This increases of course the cost of the manufactured grain, and renders it more difficult for the manufacturers of Great Britain to compete with those of this country, both in our own and foreign markets. If, by the repeal of the corn laws, the price of bread should be reduced in England, and the price of grain increased in this country, the cost of manufacturing would be increased here and reduced there. It would consequently be more difficult for our manufacturers to compete with those of Great Britain.

It therefore cannot be to the interest of the manufacturers of this country to seek or desire a repeal of the British corn laws. How does the matter stand in regard to the grain growers of this country? Great Britain has access to the markets of Great Britain through the colonial ports of Canada and New Brunswick, at a very low duty. The grain growers of the continent of Europe cannot avail themselves of this advantage, and consequently their grain costs more in competition with the grain of the corn laws were repealed, the grain of the continent being much cheaper than ours, would exclude it from the British market, and consequently our agricultural interests of the middle and western states would no longer enjoy the great advantage they now have over all other grain growers of exclusive access to the British market through the colonial ports. I therefore assert, sir, that both the manufacturing and grain growing interests of this country would be greatly injured by the repeal of the British corn laws. Let the members from the west to weigh well and look with caution on the arguments of the honorable gentleman, when he endeavors to raise their prejudices against the corn laws, and enlist them under his tariff banner. They should pause and well believe that the manufacturers of the north really desire the adoption of any measure which, if it has the effect they say it will, must increase the cost of labor in this country and diminish it in England. As I have shown, however, the repeal of the corn laws would increase the cost of labor in the price of grain in England, but no increase in the price of grain or labor in this country, but undoubtedly will cause a decrease in the price of both grain and labor, by depriving our grain growers of local advantages they now enjoy through the colonial ports.

Now, sir, one word in regard to this unnatural alliance of the west with the east. Where do the people of the western states feel the best and most extensive interest for their protection? In the south—in the cotton growing states! not in the east, or manufacturing districts of the union. Where do the farmers of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and all the great west and northwest send their corn, wheat and other products? Not to the east, but to the eastern manufacturers? No, sir, they send them to the south. Whose interest ought they therefore to consult—the manufacturers of the east, or the planters of the south? Let them decide when the question of a tariff for protection comes up. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has said that the question of a protective tariff is a question between free labor and slave labor—this being, when interpreted, a question of taxation on the south for the benefit of the north. Now, sir, when this question shall be presented, I shall join the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS), and demanded to know where the great state of Kentucky stands in regard to the compromise act? Is it possible that the south, which affords a market for the products of the west and manufacturers of the east, is to be deserted by the former and plundered by the latter? We shall see, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON said he did not intend to discuss the question of a tariff, the motion to print the report of the committee had suggested the subject of man from Georgia, (Mr. KING). That gentleman had said the effect of the English corn laws was to reduce the price of American grain, and therefore was advantageous to the American manufacturer. He said that South Carolina, at the present time, appeal to the west to support his peculiar notions upon the subject of a tariff. Now, he (Mr. P.) wished his friend from Georgia, when he made his appeal, to be prepared to convince us of the west that reducing the price of our great staple, grain, was the way to make us rich.

Mr. KING said he was misunderstood. Mr. ADAMS had been, he said, patient or rather an impatient listener to this debate, and although he had carefully refrained from taking part in it, he had long and useless discussions which had characterized the last three weeks, yet he felt it due to himself now to say a few words.

Mr. A. after alluding to the habitual feeling of regret and wounded pride he had ever felt towards the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS), expressed the exceeding regret and pain with which he (Mr. ARNOLD) had witnessed how ardently that gentleman had seized upon every topic which was presented to him, and uttered a few words, which were not like the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. PICKENS), who had expressed his regret that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) was not in his seat. On the contrary, he (Mr. A.) rejoiced that that gentleman was not present to hear the remarks of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts. It was with pain that he had witnessed the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts during this session, and from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FORTNACE), he had witnessed the course of the gentleman from Virginia. And although what he (Mr. A.) said might have no influence upon gentlemen, yet he would say—he felt it due to himself and the country to record the facts of his own observation, who had seen in this house, both from the north and the south.

[Cries of—that is true—that is true.]

He had voted the other day to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. FORTNACE), on the table, because he (Mr. A.) thought that it was not offered in good faith. Whenever any important memorial or document was presented here in good faith, and a representation of its contents was made, (as in the case of this memorial), he was willing to vote to print it, that it might be sent forth to the country for the information and enlightenment of the people, who were not in the mass politicians. That being the tribunal of the last resort, it was right that they should be kept in the light, and his vote had been here, and would be, to print all papers and documents necessary to that end. But he had entertained a very different opinion of the memorial presented the other day. He believed it was motivated.

The case was presented with the remark that it was not offered to impugn the motives of members.

Mr. ARNOLD said he was not doing so. That memorial prayed for a protective tariff. Those who knew the memorial, and the gentleman who presented it, knew that to speak of a protective tariff to the south was to open Pandora's box. And the memorial was couched in language likely to be most offensive, and calculated to affect the course alike of southern and northern men who might be in favor of a bank, but might have conflicting opinions on the subject of the tariff. His vote upon all questions which did not legitimately come up for the action of the house during the extra session was not to be taken as an expression of the vote he might give hereafter. He would vote now to give the go-by to all questions except those for the consideration of which congress had been convened; he would do nothing but the business which he had been sent to do.

Mr. A. after a brief allusion to the compromise act, and to his own course thereon, said he would not now go into the question of the tariff. Whenever the issue should be presented to the American people by a voluntary involuntary law, he would be one of every solution. His opinions on this subject were fixed; he wished not to agitate it now, but he wished that the house should proceed to do the business of the country. He wished we could have a test question, that we might know who were our friends and who our foes in this house—who were for us and who against us; because, if it should be ascertained that nothing could be done, he should be for adjourning forthwith. It was to be regretted that many of our friends considered themselves whigs, and representing whig districts, with large majorities, should not only be found against us, but be found voting with the opposition on this floor. There was a powerful opposition proper, and there was an opposition improper, (so to speak), and the latter was the one which he wished to see disarmed. Now, he wished to know what he had to depend upon. If, owing to defections in the whig ranks, the opposition had become so strong that nothing could be done, why they had better go some other way, and spend the time in doing so, in everlasting fire debating and brawling upon every little trifling question that was brought before the house. It was a serious question whether the friends of the administration in this house, or the opposition party, with its new ally, districts, in a majority, and unless they could go on and do business, the sooner the session was brought to an end the better.

Mr. FILLMORE said that, unless there was some important business before the house, he would move the committee of ways and means had much business to do, move that the house adjourn.

Objections in several quarters.

Mr. F. said he would then move that the committee of ways and means have to sit during the sessions of the house until further order.

Mr. GILMER said it was very desirable that members of the committee should be present during this discussion, because, in the first place, it involved a most important question, and, in the second place, remarks of this kind were affecting the very organization of that committee, to which it would be proper to reply.

Mr. FILLMORE was then understood to withdraw both motions.

Mr. W. W. LIVING said that he had voted for the resolution offered on Saturday last by his colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FURNACE], viz: to refer a petition presented by him, on the subject of the tariff, to the committee on manufactures, with instructions. He had done so because he considered the motion right in itself. He did not stop to inquire as to the motive which influenced his colleague, or whether the resolution was the result of a caucus deliberation, and introduced with a view, as some supposed, to embarrass the action of congress at the extra session. It was of no consequence to him that others, who were supposed to participate in that caucus, had dodged the question on this floor. He was perfectly willing to take it for granted that there had been a class of sentiment on this subject on the part of his colleague and some of those politically associated with his colleague—a change similar to that which seemed to have taken place on another important question. He was willing to believe that gentlemen who had slept soundly during the whole period of a former administration, had become suddenly awakened to the interests of their country on the vital question of the tariff, as in the other house, where they had been suddenly aroused from their slumber by another important question—the controversy with Great Britain respecting the outrage on the Caroline. These changes of sentiment were wholesome evidences of the influence of public opinion. He was content, therefore, to vote for a resolution that his colleague's resolution was offered bona fide, and his vote was accordingly given in its favor.

But he regretted to find that only a minority of the house voted with him, [Mr. L.] on the resolution, that a proposition to amend in itself should get the go by with the assent of a large majority of all parties; that so many of all parties on this floor should manifest such nervous shrinking and timid sensitiveness whenever the subject of the tariff and protective duties was referred to, however remotely, would cause surprise and astonishment in the minds of those he had the honor to represent. He was grieved, too, on Saturday last, when the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARRETT], had moved a resolution referring the various topics embraced in the president's message to appropriate committees, that this question was the only one overlooked. He [Mr. L.] had endeavored to supply the oversight by an amendment directing a reference to the committee on manufactures, but was cut off by the sudden and prompt application of the previous question. Why was this, asked, Mr. L.? Is this question of the tariff to be shunned and avoided like the school of abolition? Are the industrial classes of the community to be deprived of a hearing on this floor? Why object to the printing of the memorial now presented? Why not refer all such memorials to the committee on manufactures, thus leaving the appropriate committee? Why not throw the responsibility on that committee, and let them investigate the subject? If it is inexpedient to act upon this question at the present session, let the committee say so. Even if the house is precluded from action now, is there no reason why the intervals of leisure afforded by the discussion and consideration of other topics could not be appropriately occupied by the committee in the investigation of this subject. He believed it was conceded by all opponents of a protective tariff that, in the adjustment of duties on imports for mere revenue purposes, incidental protection might be given to domestic industry by discriminating duties. He would ask if that very matter of discrimination is appropriately referred to the committee on manufactures, and he would appeal to the liberality even of those opposed on principle to the protective system to treat this question with the same fairness which they accorded to other questions.

Mr. PICKENS submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, now, in making this appeal to the liberality of the gentlemen from the south, he could reconcile the distinction raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts between free labor and slave labor, &c.

Mr. LIVING said it would be unbecoming in him to offer any explanation as to the meaning of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, whilst that gentleman was here so ready and willing to explain his own meaning. It would be presumptuous in him, [Mr. L.] and he would not attempt it.

Mr. LIVING resumed. He could assure gentlemen that all attempts to give this question the go by would prove futile. The manufacturers and mechanics and working men of the country would be heard. They never would consent that their petitions and memorials praying the consideration of congress to subjects in which they feel a deep interest, should meet the fate of abolition petitions, when their workshops were closed and all branches of domestic industry languishing for want of the fostering care of government. The question could not be long evaded. It would have to be met within a short period, at the next session at farthest. The period limited by what was called the compromise act was close at hand: an act manifestly in violation of popular sentiment—against the known sentiments of the majority of the people of these U. States, and caused by the threat and menace of a small minority of those people. He, [Mr. LIVING], would fail in his duty to the manufacturing and industrial constituents whom he had the honor to represent, if he did not protest against the course which gentlemen of all parties seemed disposed to pursue on this, to them, and to the whole country, most important question. Whenever the opportunity would be afforded, it was his intention to move a reference of that part of the president's message which related to the tariff and duties on imports to the committee on manufactures. He would ask, at the same time, that all petitions on those subjects now laid on the table might have the same appropriate reference. If this resolution, which should be voted down, he now gave notice of his intention, at the proper time, to introduce a resolution which gentlemen might consider a test question, and which he believed could not be evaded, it would tend to desire the introduction of any embarrassing topic at the present session, but he could not close his eyes to the obvious demands of duty upon him as the representative of a hard-working, honest and industrious people. Gentlemen spoke of what was going on in England on the subject of protective duties. It was true that Lord John Russell had introduced a bill for the modification of the corn laws, proposing a reduction of duties, it was said, equivalent to fifty per cent. It was at least doubtful whether the introduction would be successful or fall a sacrifice to that measure, if, indeed, the measure itself originated in sincerity. Who could tell what would be its practical effect on the manufacturing and agricultural interests of this country? Not one man in all this nation. The effect, many feared, would be the entire prostration of American industry, and the arraying against our manufacturing interests other interests which hitherto had been united to them. Who, in this nation, could foresee the end of the agitation now going on in Great Britain on the subject of her corn law? It might end like the famous controversy about free trade in that country years ago.

Gentlemen would recollect the famous rallying cry of "High rates and free trade" which British manufacturers and British merchants spread even on this side of the Atlantic, with the view of affecting the decision of this very question on a former occasion. When the American compromise bill was introduced on the part of Mr. L., it was a free trade. It remains to be seen whether all this agitation and excitement on the subject of the corn laws, on the other side of the Atlantic, have not their origin in kindred motives, and are not intended to work similar results in this country. He trusted that the motion to print the memorial would prevail.

Mr. BOTTS rose and said that he knew of no practical good that could result from this debate, and as there was no important business before the house, he would give notice before the committee of ways and means that might be matured probably in the course of three or four hours, if the house would afford an opportunity, and then be prepared for the action of the house to-morrow, he would move an adjournment.

Mr. ADAMS asked the yeas and nays.
Mr. BOTTS said he had made his motion simply for the purpose of affording the committee of ways and means an opportunity to prepare business for the action of the house, he would withdraw his motion to adjourn, and move the previous question on the motion to print.

[Cries of "That is it!"]
But the house, by yeas 79, noes 80, refused to second the demand.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

July 22. Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented a petition of citizens of Dearborn county, in that state, praying congress for the passage of a general bankrupt law this session.

Mr. THILLMAGE presented petitions for the same object, from New York, and Reading, Berks county, Pa.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a remonstrance against the same from citizens of New York.

The following resolution submitted, yesterday, by Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, was adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury prepare and lay before the senate, a list of all articles imported and subject to a duty of less than 20 per cent, and report under its existing laws; and also, restricting the rate of duties paid on each, and the amount of duties paid on each class of these articles, in 1837, 1838 and 1839, with the whole value of these articles imported in each of these years.

The resolution of Mr. BENSON was adopted, requesting the secretary of the United States to communicate to the senate the proceedings and reports of the commissioners appointed to examine into the conduct of contractors and agents on the public buildings.

A resolution offered yesterday by Mr. HENDERSON was adopted, calling on the navy department to prepare and lay before the senate, at as early a day as possible, at the next session of congress, a report on the necessity and propriety of a naval depot and navy yard at the Gulf of Mexico.

The bill to change the place of trial of general Gratiot, was taken up, and after considerable debate, the question on its passage was negatived; yeas 19, noes 26.

According to notice of yesterday, Mr. BERRIN moved to amend the bankrupt bill. His amendment had been directed anxiously to this measure, as appeared from the numerous memorials presented since they had been in session. The bill was the subject first introduced at an anterior session, with a single change as to the limitation of the time it was to be in force. It contained two principles: the one relating to voluntary bankrupt, and applicable to all persons without limit to the amount of indebtedness; the other compulsory, and applicable to merchants, retailers, brokers, underwriters and marine insurers, the amount of whose debt must not be less than $2,000.

The motion was then carried, the bill taken up, and read through by sections, the objects of which, Mr. B. severally and briefly explained.

A debate arose on the fifth section, Mr. BARROW inquiring if its provisions were not in conflict with those of the second, which was imported to Louisiana, as protecting the rights of married women and minors, under their peculiar system.

After explanation on this by Messrs. BERRIN, HUNTINGTON, WALKER and BARROW, no amendment being made, the remainder of the bill was read, and one or two slight modifications adopted.

The bill was then taken up by the senate, when Mr. NICHOLSON said he intended, if offered by no one else, to move an amendment, to include within the provisions of the bill, all banks, whether incorporated or not. But as he had not prepared it, he would defer it to be put in on another day, to give time for the preparation of amendments, the senate went into executive session; and, after which, adjourned.

July 23. Resolutions were submitted by Messrs. Phelps and Henderson, which he over one day.

Mr. PRESTON, from the committee on military affairs, reported house bill making appropriations for fortifications and for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities, without amendment.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bankrupt bill, as the general order.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the bill, so as to include incorporations within its provisions.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, suggested to the senator that he had better be put in his amendment to exclude such corporations as were owned wholly or in part by states.

Mr. NICHOLSON then sent to the chair the following proviso, to come in the 21st line of the first section of the bill:

"Provided, That all banking corporations, except those in which the stock is owned wholly or in part by a state, or for which a state is responsible, chartered for the purpose of issuing notes or other evidences of debt, shall be put in the same class as they shall be liable to become bankrupt according to this act."

Mr. NICHOLSON advocated the amendment at some length. He made the modification at the suggestion of his friends from Alabama, but he had not the slightest doubt of the power of congress to include all banks. The evil this sought to remedy had been extensively felt in more than two-thirds of this union, in which the currency was different in kind and value. The amendment he had proposed would reach the evil by holding out to every bank the certainty of its dissolution in case of suspension.

Mr. BERRIN attached immense importance to the amendment. The opinion in regard to banking corporations in a bankrupt bill was a growing one. He contended that they came within the provisions of a bankrupt act, as many of them had suffered from the act of having mixed up with their legiti-mate business the perils of banking. He insisted that the effect of such a provision would be to separate the sound banks from the rotten ones, and would act as a better regulator than any national institution possibly could do.

Mr. Woodbury could see no reason why natural persons should be subject to all the penalties of this law, and artificial persons should not. He quoted Mr. Appleton's opinion in favor of the application of such a law, as most likely to be more effectual in preventing specie payments than any other measure whatever.

Mr. Williams pointed to the state of Maine, where the bankrupt law of the state was in force against banks, to which he, in a great measure, attributed their present soundness.

Mr. Sevier contended that the subject belonged wholly to the states, and that for this government to meddle to do what the states had not done, was an implication that the states had not acted correctly; and he for one would not sanction it by his vote.

Mr. Berrien replied at length against the adoption of the amendment. He thought difficulties might occur in arranging the details and the clashing of unjust interests with the state and United States courts. Another insuperable objection was that the banks were laboring under embarrassments, from the present position of affairs, and the application of the provisions of this act could not be extended to them without acting on the whole indebted community.

Mr. Walker said this had ever been a favorite measure with him, since its first introduction in 1837. There was no danger of the clashing of individual interests, because the bankrupt law would override the state laws, and it was for that purpose it was needed to give uniformity to its action.

Mr. Bayard moved to amend the amendment by striking out the words "except those in which the stock is owned wholly or in part by a state, or for which a state is responsible," giving his reasons therefor of some length.

Mr. Henderson followed at some length. Mr. Clay, of Alabama, had some scruples as to the power of the general government to interfere with institutions emanating from states, but when it was sought to enlarge their powers he must at once oppose the amendment.

Mr. Smith, of Conn. said that where the powers of the state and general governments were in conflict under this act, the state must yield. He thought this the time, above all others, for the insertion of such a provision in the bill.

Mr. Benton said many of his friends were not prepared to vote on this amendment, and he would propose that it be printed, and lie over till to-morrow morning.

Mr. Berrien said the matter had been repeatedly before the senate, and as they were much behind the house, he hoped no delay would be made.

Mr. Benton then moved to lay the bill on the table, which was carried; yeas 26, nays 17.

Mr. Clay then gave notice that he should move to take up the bank bill to-morrow.

Mr. Tallmadge moved to go into executive session.

Mr. Clay moved to take up the bankrupt bill now; and on that called the yeas and nays.

Mr. Tallmadge withdrew his motion, and the question being on the motion to take up the bankrupt bill, Mr. Clay appealed to the friends of the bill to suffer them to go on with it now, and not wait in this manner for the various amendments, greatly retarding the bill, as they had a mass of business on their table.

The question was then taken, and the senate decided to take up the bill, by yeas 26, nays 22.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Bayard, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Choate, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merck, Miller, Morehead, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Claiborne, Crittenden, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Ind. Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and decided in the negative, as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Claiborne, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merck, Miller, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Woodbury, Wright, Young—17.

Rivers, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Woodbridge—34.

Mr. Tallmadge moved to adjourn. The long and exhausting sessions, and the heat of the weather, were such as to cause great weariness and lassitude. The motion was lost—17 to 23.

Mr. Wright then moved to strike out that clause which related to the privileges allowed to married women and minors, in the second section, on the ground that it deprived the bill of that uniformity of system which ought to belong to a general bankrupt law.

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. Huntington and Walker.

Mr. Mouton said, if this provision was stricken out, he could not give his support to the bill.

The question was then taken on striking out, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Preston, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merck, Miller, Morehead, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Woodbridge—37.

Mr. McRoberts moved to amend the bill by striking out "more than two months" from the second section, but it did not prevail.

The suggestion of Mr. Young, the bill was so amended to exclude from the privileges of the act all persons who had alien trusts confided to them.

The bill having been reported to the senate as amended, on the question that this bill be engrossed, Mr. Preston rose and delivered his views at some length in opposition against the general features of the bill, declaring it to favor the debtor interest alone, while that of the creditor was entirely overlooked.

The question being taken on the engrossment, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merck, Miller, Morehead, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Claiborne, Crittenden, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Woodbury, Wright—22.

July 24. Mr. Tallmadge presented a bundle of memorials asking the enactment of a bankrupt law. They were from cities and other portions of the interior of the states of N. York and Pennsylvania. The two resolutions submitted respectively by Mr. Phelps, calling for information in relation to our commercial intercourse with Sardinia and other countries, were taken up and adopted.

The bankrupt law was then read a third time, and the question, "shall this bill pass?"

Mr. Tallmadge rose and spoke for upwards of an hour in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. Buchanan followed at some considerable length against the principles of the bill and its details.

Mr. Walker followed in reply, contending, with great earnestness, for the principles of the bill and its details.

Mr. Berrien replied at length to the arguments of Mr. Tallmadge in defending, with much zeal, the principles and details of the bill.

Mr. Preston said, as the bill involved very important principles, he would move that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the passage of the bill, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merck, Miller, Morehead, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Claiborne, Fulton, Graham, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Pierce, Preston, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Woodbury, Wright—23.

Mr. Clay then moved to take up the bank bill, and requested that the question on agreeing with the committee on the several amendments should be taken separately on each.

This motion having been agreed to, the question was taken, and several of the amendments were concurred in.

The amendment to the 11th section having been taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

"Provided no assignment or transfer of stock shall at any time be made to others than citizens of the United States, or corporations and companies of the several states, or of the United States and territories thereof; and, if otherwise made, the same shall be void, and the stock so unlawfully transferred shall be forfeited and accrue to the surplus fund of the bank."

Mr. Clay said he could not on full reflection agree to that amendment. It was putting a restriction on the holder of the stock, which would impair the value of his property. He thought the other provisions, which forbade foreigners and foreign corporations from taking any stock, were amply sufficient without the insertion of this proviso. The bill already contained a clause which would impair the value of the stock, and the stock so unlawfully transferred should be voided and accrue to the surplus fund of the bank.

Mr. Walker declared that to confine the taking of stock to the holders of the United States would be rendered entirely nugatory, if this provision were abandoned. What difference did it make if the stock was allowed to be sold by owners to foreigners, and what guard would the other proviso be if American owners could sell to them at pleasure? None whatever. And this clause would impair the value of the stock, and the stock so unlawfully transferred would be voided and accrue to the surplus fund of the bank.

Mr. Benton said that if it was to be made, it would be much more likely, and there would be much stronger ground for it, if the bank should be in possession of British stockholders, and in that event it would be more easily vanquished.

Mr. Henderson made some observations; when Mr. Clay, of Alabama, demanded the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The question stood for striking out 24, against it 26.

The following amendment to the 17th section having been reported:

"Giving to any number of stockholders of said bank not less than ten, and to their agents or attorneys in fact, the privilege in such examination to inspect any and all private and individual accounts, dealings, and accommodations with said bank and its several offices of discount and deposits."

Mr. Clayton hoped the amendment would not be concurred in, and pointed out the effects likely to ensue from its adoption.

Mr. Walker said this amendment was made on his motion, and had been concurred in by the whole of the committee, and he could not see how it could be rejected. It was on this very provision. Could it be possible that, after all the abuses which experience had shown to have sprung from the want of such a feature in the bill, it should be rejected? Unless gentlemen intended that all the proceedings of the bank should be veiled in secrecy and mystery, they would not interfere with that proposition.

Mr. Clay said that the evils which gentlemen seemed to fancy could not occur. If there was any bank bill which came within a hundred miles of the present in point of guards and restrictions, he should like to see it. What did the prior clause of the section say? Had not the head of the treasury the right to inspect books, papers, and even accounts of individuals? Was not the condition of the bank to be published monthly? And were not the bank and its branches open at all times to the free and unrestricted inspection of a committee of either house of congress, committee of the stockholders, or of the public?

Mr. Clayton said that "shrouding in secrecy" was not the object of the amendment. He said that the present charter had outstripped all that had ever preceded it, in the case taken to prevent every abuse. By the amendment he would place the institution in the hands of not less than ten, and owning only a single share of stock, which might have been obtained only the day before, have the right to go into an examination of all the private dealings of the bank. Such a clause would place the institution in the hands of the disposal of its enemies. Persons, from whom, caprice or malice, could derange or interrupt its functions. He would therefore move to modify the amendment so as to insert after the word "ten," "such stockholders as may be designated by the board of directors, and shall hold the same three months prior thereto."

Mr. Walker said that the amendment had been placed where it stood after a solemn argument in the committee. Now, the proposition was to open the examination to such stockholders as might be designated, but not to the poor. Before an examination can be made the stockholders must own $5,000 worth of stock, while ten individuals with one or more shares only could have that privilege. Why make the right to stock more exclusive than the law? Why make so odious a discrimination, and one so directly at war with the genius and spirit of our institutions? Why not have it open to all? We should demand the very best and say:

Mr. Clay. The pool the pool were to be abridged of their right? How so? Was it to be supposed that any ten stockholders who might get hold of a single share for the purpose of trying to deprive the owners of individuals, or of destroying the institution, would be permitted to do so? What merchant, what business man, would keep his accounts or make his deposits in such an institution, under such circumstances? The question was not as the Senate had supposed, to prevent examination, but he did not desire to see the amount so small that any speculator or his agent should have the power to examine into the concerns of the bank for sinister purposes. The senator from Mississippi was mistaken in supposing that each one of the stockholders should hold five hundred shares; it was that amount in their aggregate capacity; it was necessary that amount should be represented before such examination was made; and any stockholders living close by for fear could at any time associate together—that was, any nine of them could associate with one, if they pleased, so as to secure the object. The principle of his amendment came from the other house; the popular, the democratic branch. Mr. Walker was not aware that the other branch had adopted the feature.

Mr. Clay said it was in the bill before that body. The question on the amendment being taken, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Ala., Colburn, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Colburn, Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—26.

So the motion was lost. Mr. Clay now expressed a hope that the entire amendment would be rejected.

Mr. Porter had voted for the amendment. His personal experience in relation to the banking principle, and he thought the principle of publicity a very salutary one; but he was not aware at the time of the abuse to which it might be subjected. He would move to modify the amendment so as to insert after the words "each of whom shall hold not less than five shares."

Mr. Walker professed himself satisfied with the modification, and it was adopted.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment as amended, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

So the amendment was lost. On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate then adjourned.

July 26. Mr. Sevier presented a letter from the secretary of war in relation to the claim of a Cioctaw Indian now in this city, praying for the confirmation of certain land titles to that tribe.

Mr. Clay, of Ky., presented a petition signed by many respectable inhabitants of the city of Washington, who were men of business, calling the attention of congress to the business condition of the District of Columbia, owing to the state in which the banks of the District were left by the late administration, and respectfully asking the recharter of the banks of the District for a limited time.

The bank bill was then taken up, the question being on the further concurrence with the amendments of the committee.

The amendment providing that the bank shall not increase the amount of debts due to it when the notes exceed three times the amount of specie in its vaults, was, on motion of Mr. Clay, of Ky. modified so as to provide that the bank shall not knowingly increase the amount of debts due to it, when the notes in circulation exceed three times the amount of specie in its vaults; and whenever such excess takes place, it shall be the duty of said corporation to return to its proportion, with as little delay as will be safe and practicable.

The amendment was opposed by Messrs. Clay, and Huntington, and advocated by Messrs. Walker, Clay, of Ala. and Linn.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of the committee rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Colburn, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Claiborne, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

Mr. Clay opposed the amendment in the same fundamental rule, providing that no note or bill of which any member of either house of congress of the United States, is maker, drawer, endorser, acceptor, or otherwise a party, shall be discounted.

Mr. Walker said, to remove the senator's objection, he would propose a modification, to provide that no note should be discounted by a member of congress. Would the senator compromise? He had before compromised, and on this ground they might compromise.

Mr. Clay said it would be a great improvement, but the amendment would still be open to objection, as an unreasonable interdiction in members of congress. He would vote for the amendment, if the senator would either, that he should be otherwise obliged to vote against the whole amendment.

Mr. Walker then moved to strike out the amendment and insert, the proviso, that no note or bill shall be discounted for any member of either house of congress.

Mr. Buchanan said no member of congress ought to be a borrower at this bank, and he was willing to interdict them to this manner, which was but a small injury to them, as there were many other banks in which they might borrow. If this power was given, the directors would assist each other in making loans.

Mr. Clay said the directors of the bank were not to have any loans, and therefore they would have to comply with the directors of the branches.

Mr. Buchanan advocated the amendment at some length.

Mr. Culbert dwelt on the propriety of the majority adopting the amendments, of a just nature, of the constitution, in order to avoid all idea of the bank being a political institution.

By general consent, the amendment of the committee was adopted, unanimously, the amendment proposed by Mr. Walker, who then, at some length, rejected the amendment as modified.

Mr. Benton read from the report of the investigation of the proceedings of the late bank, a statement showing the amount of its loans to members of congress, editors of newspapers, &c. Mr. Clay further opposed the amendment. What was the principle contained in it? It was that members of congress should not share in the benefits of an institution to be created by their votes. On the same principle, it might be supposed that they voted to reduce the tariff, for the purpose of getting their clothing cheaper.

Messrs. Culbert and Linn advocated the amendment.

Mr. Pierce said the only hope to this country was in rapidity. The amendments were to be voted down.

He referred to loans of two hundred thousand dollars in one year, and three hundred thousand in another, by the old bank to members of congress.

Mr. Clay said that the greater part of the loans were made by those opposed to the bank.

Mr. Buchanan had no doubt of that.

The question was then taken; and the amendment as modified concurred in, as follows: (YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.)

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Claiborne, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

The question then being on the amendment of the committee, providing "that the entire liabilities of any one director of any said offices to said corporation may exist to an amount not exceeding ten thousand dollars," after a few remarks in its support by Messrs. Allen and Culbert, it was adopted by a large vote.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

After a concurrence in various others, the amendments of the committee were gone through.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, offered an amendment, the object of which was to allow payment of subscriptions of stock to the bank to take place in certificates of stock, issued under the act entitled "an act authorizing a loan not exceeding twelve millions dollars." This amendment was adopted without a division.

Mr. Clay offered several verbal amendments consequential on this, which were adopted.

Mr. Huntington renewed his motion for amendment made in committee, providing that no notes of less denomination than five (instead of ten) dollars shall be issued. He advocated this at some length.

After discussion by Messrs. Woodbury, Bayard, Tappan, Buchanan, Huntington, Sevier and Henderson, the amendment was lost by an equal vote, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Claiborne, Clay, of Ala., Colburn, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wood, Wright, Young—26.

Mr. Walker offered his amendment which was ordered to be printed some days since, to strike out, at page 14, from line 16th to 20th the provision that three directors shall be appointed by the president, and insert a proviso, that during the next session of congress four directors shall be appointed by congress—two by the house of representatives, to be chosen at the same ballot, each member being permitted to vote for one director only; and the two persons having the highest number of votes to be declared elected; and two directors to be chosen in like manner by the senate, and the four directors to be appointed in the same manner, on the first Monday of January of every year, during the existence of said corporation.

This, being advocated by Mr. Walker and opposed by Mr. Clay, was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Linn, McRoberts, Bates, Sevier, Sturgeon, Walker, Williams, Wright—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benson, Birney, Calhoun, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Bayard moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "debts due, and becoming due to said bank," and insert the words "the discounts, loans and other investments, bearing interest of said bank," (which should sever at any time exceed the amount of capital stock paid in, and seventy-five per cent advance thereon.)

After some conversation by Messrs. Bayard, Simmons and Buchanan, the amendment was rejected, without a division.

Mr. Linn moved to insert, at page 14, line 52, the following: "and no person who was president or director of the old Bank of the United States, during the time of the government directors were excluded from knowledge of participation in the affairs of the said bank, and shall have concurred in said exclusion or in the measures of the bank producing entrenchment, panic or pressure, in 1823 and 1834, shall not be a director or agent of this bank or any of its branches."

This was supported by Mr. Linn, and opposed by Mr. Clay. It was then rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wood, Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benson, Claiborne, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. McRoberts moved to insert, at page 15th line 60; and no person who was a director of the old Bank of the United States, or a director at the time the committee of the house of representatives was raised leave to examine said bank, shall ever be eligible to the place of director, president, or officer of any bank or any of its branches; nor shall any person be re-eligible who shall have voted for any willful invasion of the provisions of this act, during previous service therein; and every person appointed director of this bank, or any of its branches, shall take and subscribe an oath, in duplicate, declaring that he has not willfully concerned in any violation of this act; and all false swearing therein shall be held and deemed willful corrupt perjury, and be punishable therefor."

Mr. Clay hoped this bill of amendment would meet the fate of its predecessor. He would as soon vote for it on principle, as to vote to take these men up, and try and hang them without judge or jury.

Mr. McKelven said the amendment did not go far as to hang them, but disappportion to some degree ought to be expressed against them.

The amendment was lost, as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, McKelven, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Tappan, Wadsworth, Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Benton moved to insert at the 34th page, 8th line, after the word "bank,"—and so much of the constitution of the United States, and so much of the laws of the United States, and so much of every treasury regulation as are applicable to the public moneys in the treasury of the United States, shall be held and taken to apply to said moneys when deposited or placed in said bank or branches."

Mr. Clay said a previous section of the bill provided that money deposited in this bank shall be taken to be to the treasury, liable to be taken out only by check.

The amendment was rejected, as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, moved to insert at page 21, line 124, a provision that no loan should be made by said bank, or any of its branches, to any individual, company, corporation or state, of a larger amount than ten thousand dollars, so long as any applications are pending or rejected of a like amount, or good notes, or bills of exchange which are sufficiently secured.

This was rejected, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Benton moved to add at the 20th page, line 116, "nor shall any member of congress, during the time that he is a member, or for two years thereafter, be a stockholder in said bank or stockholder or owner of the bank, or any of its branches or have in any way employed, or receive any compensation from it, or any grant or bounty from it."

This was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Tappan moved to add at the close of the bill as an additional section, the following:

"And he it further enacted, that this being act to create a fiscal agent for the government of the United States, congress hereby asserts the power under the constitution, to alter or repeal the same at pleasure, except so far as it provides for the payment of the loans that may be contracted under its provisions."

To this, Mr. Walker offered the following amendment: "And provided, that no person shall be deprived of any property held under said act by such alteration or repeal, in any manner repugnant to the 5th article of the amendments to the constitution of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected without a division; and the question then being on the amendment of Mr. Tappan, this was rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. King moved to insert a prohibition of loans or discounts to the president of the United States, the vice president, to the heads of any of the executive departments, the postmaster general, and attorney general of the United States included, or to any judge of the supreme court.

After a brief discussion, by Messrs. King and Walker this amendment was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. King suggested to the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Morehead), as the amendments were completed, to suffer the bill now to be engrossed to the reading, as this would cut off further amendments that might arise to hinder the bill, and on the question of the third reading of the bill the whole subject would be open for discussion. He was prepared to take the vote on the engrossment now, if the yeas and nays should be equal, he would call the question on the final passage.

A further conversation took place, in which Messrs. Calhoun and King desired the question now to be taken on the engrossment; and Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, and Morehead declined binding themselves, and positively cutting off all amendments, if they, the friends of the bill, were responsible for it, and in the haste in which they had gone through it, they might have passed over some necessary amendments. They would agree to fix by hour to-morrow, when the opponents of the bill would agree to say twelve o'clock, when the debate should cease, and the question be taken on the amendments, if any, and on the final passage of the bill.

The decision of Mr. Berrien the senate then adjourned.

July 27. Mr. Young presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Illinois, in relation to the abolition of slavery, not only in the states and territories, but also arising upon the free influence in the matter, or any union of church and state. The motion to receive ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Allen presented a memorial from citizens of Benning, recontaining against a national bank, assumption of state debts, protective tariff, and the distribution of public lands.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial of the anti-slavery society of Pennsylvania in favor of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. Motion to receive ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a number of citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania praying the establishment of a national bank and branches in the several states.

Mr. Preston asked leave to introduce a bill, the subject of which he did not come within the scope of business laid down or action at the present session; but such was the condition of the business under the commission to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty with Mexico, that he hoped the introduction of the bill would be admitted by general consent.

Leave having been granted, Mr. P. introduced a bill to amend the act entitled an act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty with Mexico. The bill was read and referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Tappan, by general consent, introduced a joint resolution for a distribution of a certain number of copies of the Digest of Patents; which was made the special order for Friday next.

Mr. Benton sent an amendment to the chair, which he meant to offer when the duty bill came up. His said gentlemen had been hunting up every thing for taxation except physic and gun-guns. It was ordered to be printed.

The bill to establish the fiscal bank was then taken.

Mr. Morehead rose and delivered his views in favor of the bill in a speech of upwards of two hours' length.

Messrs. Calhoun, Allen, Benton and others rejoined.

Mr. Simmons then moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday on the proposition to limit the issue of notes of not less denomination than $5. He had voted in the negative, but from conversations with his friends, it was thought desirable in the present state of the currency, to make the proposed change.

Mr. Huntington briefly explained the object in view.

With the motion to reconsider was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. Benton, and advocated by Mr. Smith, of Indiana.

The question was then taken on the adoption of Mr. Huntington's amendment, and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Clay then addressed the senate of some considerable length in favor of the following amendment, which was to strike out a portion of the 16th fundamental rule, and to insert the following:

"And the said directors may also establish one or more competent offices of discount and deposits in any territory or district of the United States, and in state with the assent of such state; and when established, the said offices or officers shall not be removed or withdrawn by the said directors prior to the expiration of the charter, without the previous assent of congress: Provided in respect to any state which shall not, at the first session of the legislature thereof, have adopted the proposed amendment, resolution or other usual legislative proceeding, or conditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, the assent of the said state shall thereafter be presumed; and provided, nevertheless, that when it shall become necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers granted in the constitution, to establish an office or offices in any of the states whatever, and the establishment whereof shall be directed by law, it shall be the duty of said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

Mr. Rives followed at great length against the amendment.

Mr. Preston addressed the senate in favor of the amendment.

Messrs. Calhoun, Walker and Buchanan each spoke at length in opposition to it.

Mr. Clay rejoined, and was followed by Mr. Rives in reply at very considerable length; when the question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

Here there was cries "question on engrossment—question on engrossment."

The question being then taken, the vote stood for engrossment as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelven, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

The senate then adjourned, after a protracted session of several days.

July 28. The chair laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States, enclosing a communication from the department of

Mr. T. solicited the unanimous consent of the house to offer this resolution, and explain the necessity, expediency and justice of its adoption; but objection being made, the resolution was not received.

Mr. Underwood asked leave to report a bill providing for the repair of the Potomac bridge. Objection was made.

Mr. Briggs moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Levy, of Florida, asked leave at this time to offer a series of resolutions calling for information on one of the departments, and which he desired might be read for information. Objection was made.

Mr. Levy said that he had waited long for an opportunity to present these resolutions, affecting, as they did, the interests of the territory which he represented. He desired to be informed by the speaker when he might present them?

The speaker replied, whenever the speaker had the same privilege under the rule.

Mr. Barnard asked Mr. Briggs to withdraw his motion for the present, in order that the bill from the senate (now on the speaker's table) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States might be put on its first and second readings.

Mr. Briggs did not withdraw.

Mr. Barnard asked the yeas and nays on the motion to go into committee, which were not ordered.

And the question being taken, the vote stood: yeas 57, noes 56. But no quorum voted.

Mr. Weller moved a call of the house, which was refused.

But still no quorum voted.

Mr. Weller said that the house adjourn.

Mr. Weller said he would object to any question being taken in the absence of a quorum, and asked the yeas and nays on his motion to adjourn, which were ordered.

At the request of many members, Mr. Weller withdrew his motion to adjourn.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Briggs that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Briggs withdrew that motion.

Mr. Barnard thereupon moved to take up the senate bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. Weller and other members objected, and Mr. W. moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union; on which the yeas and nays were taken, and were, yeas 54, noes 51.

The house then again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Cushing, of Mass. in the chair), on the bill in relation to duties and drawbacks.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Johnston, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, Mr. Holmes, of S. C. replied at length to certain portions of the remarks submitted yesterday by Mr. Adams; and urged the passage of the bill.

Mr. Sergeant spoke with great earnestness and power in favor of the passage of the bill; examining it especially with reference to its bearing upon the compromise act, and contending that its provisions, whilst they amounted to a repeal of the act of July, 1832, did not affect or interfere with the provisions of that compromise act.

Mr. Gilmer made some remarks in opposition to the bill; for the passage of which, he contended, as a measure of revenue, (in which light alone he was willing now or ever to consider it), there was no necessity at this time. In the course of his remarks, Mr. G. took occasion to vindicate his own political course from aspersions which, he said, had been cast upon it in various quarters.

Mr. Linn sustained the bill at some length.

Mr. Underwood followed in some statements and arguments (looking to that conclusion, especially with reference to the article of tobacco) which, he said, he intended to offer when it would be in order for him to do so. He declared himself in favor of the passage of the bill, though he said he should vote for it with much greater satisfaction if the amendment indicated by him should be adopted. At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. U. read his amendment for information.

After a few brief remarks from Mr. Trippitt, also mainly directed to the point of retaliatory duties, Mr. James I. Fine obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise. Which motion prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The speaker then before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a communication from the secretary of state, on the subject of appropriations required for the outfit and salaries of diplomatic agents of the United States, which was read and referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Kennedy, of Md. gave notice of an amendment which he intended to offer to the revenue bill, and said that, as the amendment was one of some value, he would ask the house to let it be printed. Which was agreed to.

On leave given, Mr. Stanley, presented the petition of citizens of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the committee on the said District, and ordered to be printed.

Petitions were also presented, on leave, by Messrs. Care Johnson, of Tenn. Windsor, and Adams, of Massachusetts.

The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, July 29. Petitions were presented, by general consent, by Messrs. Adams, of Mass. and Pope, of Kentucky.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the house proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him yesterday, and laid on the table, fixing the time at which the revenue bill should be taken out of committee.

But Mr. F. now modified the resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That on Friday next at 12 o'clock M. all debate in committee of the whole on house bill No. 12 shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or they may be offered to said bill, and the same shall then be reported to the house, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee; provided, that nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the house at an earlier hour if it shall think proper.

The mover of any amendment may make a brief explanation, to which there may be a brief response; but no such explanation or response shall exceed ten minutes each, and no more than twenty minutes shall be given to any one amendment.

Mr. Lewis Williams objected to the latter part of the resolution, as contravening the rules of the house. Besides, he wished to know who was to determine what a brief explanation was. He moved a division on that part of the resolution.

The speaker said that the last part of the resolution certainly came in conflict with, and in fact changed the rule of the house.

Mr. McKay rose and suggested to Mr. Fillmore to modify his resolution by striking out Friday and inserting Saturday.

Mr. Fillmore. It so happens, from some cause or other, that there were many members frequently absent on a Saturday, and I must adhere to Friday; so at least as to dispose of the bill this week; above the previous question.

Mr. Pickens (this being, he said, a very important bill) moved a call of the house. But the house refused to order a call.

And the speaker being about to put the question on seconding the demand for the previous question Mr. McKay insisted that he had moved his amendment before the previous question was called, and said, therefore, the question should be taken upon it.

The speaker said he had understood the gentleman not as absolutely moving his amendment, but as suggesting it as a modification of the resolution, which the gentleman from New York (Mr. Zittmeyer) had declined to accept.

Much conversation took place as to the question of fact; after which, the amendment of Mr. McKay was regarded by the house as having been formally made before the motion was submitted for the previous question.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question, it was taken, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 104, noes 80. So there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken; which main question was, first, on the amendment Mr. McKay, striking out Friday and inserting Saturday.

Mr. Miller, of Missouri, asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 91, noes 101. So the amendment was rejected.

And the question then recurring on the resolution, Mr. Medill asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And the question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 113, noes 85.

The latter part of the resolution (that which allows brief explanations of amendments) was withdrawn.

Mr. Marshall asked the general consent of the house at this time to present a petition praying the passage of a uniform bankruptcy law; and was understood to say that, as he should himself vote against such a measure, he desired to say a few words in explanation. Objected to.

A message was received from the senate, through Ashbury Dickinson, esq. secretary of that body, stating that the senate had passed an act to amend an act entitled "an act to carry into effect the convention between Mexico and the United States;" and asking the concurrence of this house therein.

Mr. Chubb moved that the bill be put upon its first and second reading, with a view to its reference to the committee on foreign affairs. Objection was made.

Mr. McKay moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Barnard said he would, if in order, move to amend the motion so as that the house should first take up the business on the speaker's table.

Mr. B. said that his object was to reach the bill from the senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, in order that he might make a motion that it be printed. It would not require more than ten minutes to dispose of it.

The speaker said that this motion would not be in order unless the motion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Barnard) should first be voted down.

And the question being then taken, the motion of Mr. McKay, by yeas 100, noes 65, was agreed to.

So the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Cushing, of Massachusetts, in the chair) on the bill in relation to duties and drawbacks.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Johnston, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, Mr. James I. Fine, who was called to the floor, rose and addressed the committee during the hour.

Mr. I. had not concluded when, the hour having elapsed, the chairman interposed, and Mr. I. took his seat.

Mr. Barnard addressed the committee on the general policy and provisions of the bill.

Mr. Barnard was followed by Mr. Windsor, who, while he admitted that the sum proposed to be raised by this bill was not greater, if so great, as would be needed, objected to the mode of laying the duties, as not founded on sufficient knowledge of the details of the subject. He referred to several statements from his constituents as proving that Congress did not now possess the adequate information to act upon. He could not vote for the bill in its present form, but he would vote for amendments as had been proposed by Mr. Barnard, by substituting a direct specific duty on particular articles, such as silks, stuffs, goods, fruits and spices, which he contended would be within the provisions of the compromise act.

Mr. W. was followed by Mr. Randolph, who indicated his purpose to propose to amend the bill by imposing a duty of 20 per cent. upon rail road iron; and to exempt silk plush and soda ash from duty altogether.

Mr. Everett next addressed the committee in a speech whose interest drew most of the members round him. The committee then rose.

A message was received from the senate, through Ashbury Dickinson, esq. secretary, stating that that body had passed a bill to incorporate and authorize a local bank of the United States; and asking the concurrence of this house therein.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, the bill had its first and second reading, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wise expressed his hope that it would be considered at as early a day as possible.

Mr. Sergeant concurred in this desire.

Mr. Pickens inquired while bill would have precedence, that from the senate, or the bill which had been reported to the house from the committee of ways and means?

The chair replied, that would be for the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Pickens knew that; but wished to understand which of the two bills the gentleman from Pennsylvania meant to press?

Mr. Sergeant said, in reply, he should prefer the bill from the senate; though he would not be understood to say that it might not need some amendments.

Mr. Pickens suggested the propriety of referring the senate bill in the first place to the committee of ways and means.

(Cries of no! no!)

Mr. Ingersoll wished to have the rules suspended; that petitions on the bankrupt bill might now be presented; but before any decision on this motion, the house adjourned.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The British steamer Acadia, with 22 passengers for Halifax and Boston, reached the latter on Tuesday, in 124 days from Liverpool, from whence she brings papers of the 20th July. The Acadia exchanged salutes with the Caladoun 40 miles off Cape Ann. The Columbia made her passage out in 124 days.

Nothing of interest has occurred since our prior article. The prospect of peace is favorable. The Turco-Egyptian question is said to be settled at last. The precise result of the late elections, had not yet been ascertained, but the Tory majority would be about seventy, and so the little prospect we had of "FREE TRADE" is quietly stowed away under batches, whilst the CORN LAWS and TOBACCO RESTRICTIONS which have so long graced their tariff of duties are more signally triumphant than ever.—The people of England have, in the late resort, rejected and contemned their own cry—and it now becomes the obvious duty of the people of the United States to consider their own interest alone.

The British papers are filled with speculations as to the arrangements of the coming ministry, of which it appears agreed upon all hands that Mr. Prax is to be premier. It is therefore important that we should ascertain his sentiments as far as we can, and for that reason we extract from one of his recent eloquent speeches, so much as has relation to the position of affairs with this country.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The queen.—From the tone of some of the Tory papers, we infer that the sympathies of the queen are with the present ministers and the defeated party. The Cambridge Advertiser, a radical paper, says: "We have heard it rumored, but will not vouch for the fact, that her majesty has most graciously signified her intention of raising to the dignity of the peerage those liberal county members of the parliament who have suffered adverse circumstances, retired from the contest."

A great number of riots occurred during the recent elections, and many lives were lost. At Waterford a monster, named Morgan, three times delirious, fired a pistol loaded with slugs, at a crowd of boys and girls who were shouting, "Wyse and Barron for ever!" "Down with the Tories." Eleven of the poor children were wounded, and three of them were not expected to recover.

The landing of corn and additional guarantees for the carriage sentiments highly favorable to the preservation of peace between England and the United States. Lord MONTPELIER, who stood for the West Riding of Yorkshire—an agricultural district—lost his election by a few votes, thus spoke from the hustings:

"Stress has been laid upon the disturbed condition of several foreign countries, as affording a clue to the depression of your domestic industry. Well, but what if the distant relations of those countries with us and with each other should not mind what if they should continue? what if they should ever increase? Hostility is deprecated with America. I echo from my heart that philanthropic prayer, but I wish to devise new and additional guarantees for the harmony of nations. We have enough of fancied and trivial causes for war; give us real and solid motives for keeping peace. I fear that peace will never be long secured by the arguments of philosophers, or by the reasonings of political economists. X—Sic 23.

nominate, or by the praises of poets, or even, as the world goes now, by the precept of divines. We cannot make the lion lie down with the lamb; but we may create profitable trade between the woolens of Leeds and the sugars of the tropics. We cannot make an eagle and the sparrow into plowshares; but we can exchange the steel of Sheffield for the servants of Poland and the flour of America; and I believe statesmen will never be so safe as when they are acting upon general and comprehensive principles."

The London Globe—a ministerial paper—seems to consider the defeat of the whigs as in some sort a necessary thing, and commands the magnanimity of lord JOHN RUSSEL, in offering himself as a sacrifice to the first attempt to introduce a great principle. It takes upon it the following reflections:

"None of those great measures which have turned out our party have failed to bring them in again. No great measure, which is really called for, can fail in this country, to restore life to its authors. Our confidence, therefore, in the ultimate triumph of liberal principles of administration, is as strong as our confidence in the reason and the justice of those principles. It was hardly to be hoped that these should be recognized, in a first contest, sufficiently to amount, not only all illicit uses of influence, but all legitimate interests, hostile, at first, though imperfect in formation."

ROBERT PEEL'S SPEECH.
English politics. The speech of sir Robert Peel to his constituents of Tamworth, will prove interesting to our readers. We make an copious extracts as our space will permit.

On the foreign sugar question, he said: Gentlemen, in the course of the late session of parliament, a proposal was made by the ministers of the crown, to reduce the duty on foreign sugar, and thereby allow of its introduction to the markets of this country. Gentlemen, I opposed that proposition to the House of Commons, and I stand on those grounds. I consider the article of sugar as wholly exempt from the operation of the principle of free trade. The question is whether, after the sacrifices which this country has made for the suppression of our slave trade and the abolition of slavery, and the glorious results that have ensued and are likely to ensue from these sacrifices, we shall run the risk of losing the benefit of those sacrifices, and tarnishing forever that glory, by admitting to the British market, sugar, the produce of foreign slavery? (Loud cheers.) Mr. Knight has said that we do not refuse in other articles the produce of slave labor. He states that cotton, tobacco and coffee, are produce of that description; and he adds, that because we take these articles, it is obvious from the deduction, that we controvert our principle of the exclusion of slave labor from the British market.

The deduction, in the abstract, is correct; the proposition, in the abstract, is just. But follow it to its logical conclusion, and you cannot but be brought to the last degree the manufacturing prosperity of the kingdom, reject the cotton of the United States. But, gentlemen, there is a peculiar distinction to be taken between sugar and the articles alluded to.—Sugar has never been admitted into competition in the country, the produce of foreign slavery. And the question is, whether or not there is a sufficient supply of sugar from the free labor of our own colonies, to enable the working classes to have it in sufficient abundance; for I submit that it has almost become one of the necessities of life.

If you open the markets of England to the sugar of Cuba, you may depend upon it that you give a great stimulus to slavery and the slave trade. You make a great experiment in the West Indies, and it has hitherto been more successful than all the circumstances of the case warranted. The industry those colonies has been somewhat paralyzed by the gift of freedom to the slaves. There is now some difficulty, naturally enough, in finding for the present a sufficient supply of free labor, and there is therefore raised a disinclination in our supply of sugar, for the negroes have not yet come round to regular habits of working. It is, however, a difficulty or diminution only temporary, I apprehend, which will soon therefore be at an end. But the cause of the disinclination in the production is, I apprehend, rather of a temporary than a permanent nature. We have hopes of an increased supply from our W. India colonies, and our possessions in the East Indies offer the means of acquiring a supply of sugar to an almost indefinite extent. In this case we need not run the risk of forfeiting the character we have already acquired at such an immense sacrifice by the abolition of slavery and the slaves, for we have a possible result of increased supply of sugar from the West Indies, and a new supply from the East Indies of sugar produced by free labor. (Hear, hear.) These considerations lead me to the conclusion that it is not necessary to open the markets of England to sugar the produce of slave labor. (Cheers.)

The corn laws.

Gentlemen: I must here repeat the opinion which I have declared here before, and also in the house of commons, that I cannot consent to substitute a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter on foreign corn, for the present ascending and descending scale of duties. (Cheers.) I prefer the principle of the ascending and descending scale to such an amount of fixed duty. And when I look at the burthen the land is subject to in this country, I do not consider the fixed duty of 8s. a quarter on corn from Poland, and Prussia, and Russia, where no such burthen exists, a sufficient protection for it. (Great cheering.) Gentlemen, it is certainly a very important question to be put to your corn at the cheapest market. (Hear, hear.) But gentlemen if you adopt that theory in practice, you must, as a matter of common justice, compare the burthen on the land in other countries with the burthen on the land in this country. (Cheers.) The land of this country is most heavily burthened; you cannot consent that, [addressing disturbers in the crowd.]

Look at the amount of poor's rate as levied on land, as compared with that levied on the productive means of manufacturing industry. [Loud cheers.] Who pay the highway rates? Who pay the tithe? I say, not, perhaps, altogether, but chiefly the landed occupiers of this country. And, gentlemen, if corn be the produce of other lands, not subject to these burthens, but the sugar would not be just to the land of this country, which bears them all, to admit at a low duty. [Hear, hear.] The duty of 8s. a quarter is proposed by the government; if this proposition be adopted, I foresee a redundancy of foreign corn when you are not in want of it, when your own harvests are profitable and abundant; but when the time of scarcity shall arrive it will be impossible for you to levy a duty of 8s. a quarter on foreign corn. Gentlemen, what provision, I ask you, is to be made for that contingency? [Hear, hear.] If corn be at 70s. or 80s. a quarter, will it be possible to levy the fixed duty of 8s. a quarter? [Hear, hear.] By whom is it to be taken off, and when? Once off, by whom is it to be taken again? [Hear, hear.] Take a series of years for your averages—make this experiment, (so doubtful in its issue to me the least of it), and, after all, you will have, as he, the great advocates of this fixed duty, tells you, to give to the land the burden of corn. What, then, becomes of the cry of "cheap bread?"

Gentlemen, it is said that the state of manufactures and commerce of this country is so distressed that it is necessary to change the present corn law to reduce and give to the land the burden of corn. What interest than I do in the manufacturing prospects of this country. Gentlemen, it is possible that I can recollect the origin of my own prosperity—is it possible that I can reflect that I own all I possess—but I owe all I possess to manufacturing industry. I do not feel the most lively interest in all that affects the trade and manufactures of the country? [Cheers.] No, gentlemen, I should be acting a most ungrateful part if I forgot these circumstances. [Cheers.] It is possible that I have also the duty of the working classes, should not be anxious for the adoption of every measure to enable them to command the necessities, and, if possible, the luxuries of life? [Cheers.] Gentlemen, I have that feeling to its fullest extent; but I have also the duty of the working classes, should not be anxious for the adoption of every measure to enable them to command the necessities, and, if possible, the luxuries of life? [Cheers.] Gentlemen, I have that feeling to its fullest extent; but I have also the duty of the working classes, should not be anxious for the adoption of every measure to enable them to command the necessities, and, if possible, the luxuries of life? [Cheers.] Before we make the change, we should be well convinced of the fact, that the distress which is complained of, and for which we all grieve arises from the operation of the corn laws. [Cheers.]

U. S. SENATE. The following table shows the standing of the U. S. senate, for the first session of the 26th congress—also the second session—with the first session of the 27th congress, convened 31st May, 1841. The senate consists of 53 members, and is divided into three classes; one class to be elected every other year; term 6 years. Each class stands in its proper column, with the date of its termination. A star designates, Van Buren members.

CURRENCY. Currency has been the topic of long and labored investigation, and it may seem presumptuous to attempt to settle any principle in relation to it. But if it is an important subject, it ought to be understood; we therefore give our views of it, in the hope of aiding in the settlement of the great question. Currency is that form of capital or credit used as a circulating medium; or any thing which, in a given locality, will purchase commodities or pay debts without further negotiation. This is the simplest illustration of the term. Currency is also "capital seeking investment." Capital is accumulated by labor, aided by capital; and its first form is the product of labor, whatever it may be. If this product is to be used by the producer, or bartered for some other form of capital, each party desiring to consume what he obtains, no currency is required or used; but if the producer desires to invest the product of his labor for future use in some substance not at hand, he first converts it into currency, that it may be ready for investment when the desired object is presented, and whilst thus waiting investment, it remains currency. To determine whether it is currency or not, it is immaterial whether the substance be bank notes, bank deposits, or gold; the fact that the owner desires to invest it, and can do so when the object of desire is presented, constitutes its essential characteristic.—Gold hoarded is not currency, but capital invested for future use. So bank notes and bank deposits, while the owner or holder has no desire to change their character, or to use them, are capital invested; but the moment the desire to invest arises, they are currency; hence currency, being a medium of exchange, is extremely scarce, whilst the apparent amount of money has in no degree diminished; the desire to invest having ceased, the currency is diminished proportionably.

The most objectionable form of currency is bank deposits. In a period of confidence, the bank holding, and the party owning them, are both desirous of investing them, and currency is thereby doubled; while in a period of panic, they are ready at hand to be invested in real estate, or other then most desired. Bank notes may first be collected before they can be invested, and then can only be once invested; they are, therefore, a less objectionable form of currency. The currency of the United States, with the exception of a small amount of metal in circulation, consists of bank deposits and bank notes, or of the credits of banks. The amount in use is seriously estimated, but one hundred and seventy-five millions of dollars is an approximation to the truth, and sufficiently correct to illustrate our purpose. This mass of credit has grown up with the nation during the last half century. It adds nothing to the substantial capital of the country; yet it performs all the functions of capital, and is a gain to the nation, equal to the amount of metal which would be required for its currency. Its liquidation in metal is an impossibility, and it never was contemplated by the parties who issued or received it, nor can it properly be considered a part of the contract. It will continue to exist and perform its functions while confidence remains, and will perish whenever its character is doubted, or whenever, to any great extent, its conversion into metal is demanded. An adverse foreign demand for ten per cent. of the currency in metal, would at once destroy the convertibility of the whole mass. Unlike metal, it will not revert to capital, that being a material substance, always exchangeable; but will utterly perish, leaving the community to want of capital, the first elements of wealth—currency. By "legalized suspensions," or "facilities" in various forms, miserable substitutes may be provided; and these substitutes are not matters of choice, depending upon the will of the banks or the public, but of absolute necessity, essential to the very existence of the social compact; for a currency, good or bad, will exist.

To a nation like our own, of limited capital and ample room for its employment, the benefits of a currency of credit hardly be appreciated, and these advantages render it idle to propose its abandonment. The proposal to destroy one hundred and seventy-five millions of the capital of the nation, would be an absurdity perceptible at once; but since credit performs all its functions, and has done so for fifty years, it is only by failing to see its true relation to the interests of the country, that its abandonment is advocated by those really desiring the country's welfare.

Such is the currency of the United States—a mere mass of credit; the representative of real wealth in the hands of the debtors of the banks which furnish it, and rarely exceeding in amount one half of the property upon which it rests—perhaps the least valuable form of wealth, but yet less valuable than like amount of metal, yet liable to be paralyzed or destroyed in an hour by an adverse condition of the foreign exchanges. This adverse condition of exchanges may arise from various causes, and is therefore important to be formidable. European wars, inducing a disposition to hoard, or the payment of armies, might bring this calamity upon us, from the fact that we prefer to Europe an open market, to which she will resort to purchase goods, to be rid of her surplus, or desires to purchase gold. From this condition it is impossible for us, by any other process than countervailing duties, to extricate ourselves. If we abandon the system, we cannot abandon the obligations which have grown out of it. The individual and public debt will still remain. If we denounce the banks and ruin their credit, they have only to suspend their own loans of credit, and they will still hold the obligations of the public for three hundred and fifty millions, the amount of their capitals, to be paid by a community without a currency, which would sweep into the coffers of the banks the entire estate of the nation. All industry would be at an end, and "nada ou rien" would be the universal sentiment of society. Such a condition of things cannot be contemplated without horror. It must never be—but it will occur, unless, by the strong arm of law, we prevent the importations which destroy our own industry, and create a balance against us. We have no longer credit in Europe—a fortunate event. Our state stocks are now too low in the scale of depreciation to meet the difference in exchange; and it is idle to suppose that by any other process we can prevent the occurrence of the circumstances we have described.

The European manufacturer, secure of his home market, sails forth to find an outlet for his surplus; which, whether a profitable one or not, is comparatively of little importance. If suffered to remain at home, it depreciates the value of his remaining stock more than its cost. Into the first open market it is therefore thrust, and exchanged for gold, if nothing better can be found. All the commercial world, except the United States, have either a metallic or a depreciated currency, or a form of circulating; here then all centre, to be sold to the highest bidder.

Now comes the crisis in our affairs. The constitution of the United States having forbidden to the states the creation of any other legal currency than gold or silver, and the enactment of any law impairing the obligation of contracts, the banks finding the current of exchanges adverse, contract the currency; this produces pressure, which but aggravates the evil—panic ensues, confidence is lost, and the whole fabric of the currency falls, involving in one common calamity, banks, the public and the government.

To demonstrate beyond the possibility of doubt, that this is the secret source of all evils we endure, let us contrast our condition with that of France.—France has a population of 36 millions; the currency of the United States is 18 millions; we are then as 1 to 2 of France numerically. In point of capital, in the form of real estate, in utility, in buildings, animals, roads, canals, rail roads, manufactures, minerals, coal, iron, lead, and the leading constituents of wealth, we are at least in the same ratio.—In point of moral, intellectual and physical capabilities, we stand not far behind her. Of the precious metals, jewels and capital in whatever form, as also in military arrangements, France is greatly our superior; but these, while they are retained, add nothing to her ability to acquire wealth or to meet expenditures. What then is the condition of France? What is her debt? What the amount of her civil service? What her armies and navy? The debt of France is one thousand and millions of dollars; her annual expenditure 200 millions; her army, 500,000 men; her navy, 350 ships and 35,000 men, with all the munitions of war. Yet, notwithstanding all this vast expenditure of means, France is daily improving her condition, and has improved it to a great extent since 1815, when she was overrun by the allied armies, her capital in the hands of her enemies, and her treasury exhausted.

True, her population is heavily taxed, but much that is abstracted from the people in the form of taxes, returns to them in the disbursements of the government; and labor, by an increased activity, is enabled to reserve to itself a competency. What is our condition after the 25 years of peace? Is our army 250,000 men? Is our navy equal to half that of France? Is our revenue 100 millions of dollars?—Although our public debts are not five hundred millions—the proportion of our population to that of France—are our public stocks, though nearly double the interest of those of France, accredited even in our own markets, or have we an equivalent for these expenditures in any other or a better form? If unable to employ 250,000 men as soldiers, can we employ them in constructing canals and rail roads? The coast is not in the interest, and will impress itself strongly upon us, if we bear in mind that our population is half that of France, and in 25 years will be equal. From what cause does this contrast exist? Whence is derived the pay, subsistence, clothing and arms of this half million of soldiers, these naval manions, the pay of her civil service and innumerable police, the gorgeous display of her court and nobility? Could we, with our present policy, sustain a standing army of 250,000 men? Where shall we find an equivalent for this? In our bankrupt merchants—our broken down currency—our laborers asking in vain for employment; our states sacrificing their bonds in market at 40 per cent. discount, to construct a canal of a few miles extent; and the "unhappy star" alerted of an advance of her credit, equal to two dollars a head of her population, for the construction of her great public works, whilst France spends six dollars per head annually, and prospers by the outlay. Are we less intelligent, less energetic, less industrious, or four political institutions that we are thus? There must be a radical difference in the policy of the two nations to produce such differences in their capabilities. That difference is found in their foreign commercial code, and the same difference is found in the statement of Dr. Bowring, quoted above. "The principal object of the French tariff is to protect the French manufacturer; to exclude every thing which competes with him in the home market, to shut out every foreign article which can be produced at home." This is the only important difference in the policy of the two nations, and it is adequate to the result. The industry of France is sustained, and devoted to the interest of France, and the world recognizes her as a nation. Give to America industry, and talent its own glorious country to embellish, freed from the wasting influence upon her currency by European policy, which proscribes many of our staples, and burdens others with enormous duties, while they force their surplus upon us freely and without hindrance, and a few short years would change the scene. Industry would again spring into life, our currency be reanimated, and the nation be redeemed from worse than colonial bondage. [American Institute report.]

GREAT BATTLE IN THE INDIAN COUNTRY.—Under this head the St. Louis Argus, of the 23d, contains the following important and interesting piece of intelligence:—"Large numbers of Indians, negroes and mongrels, from Florida have been placed upon the borders of Arkansas and Missouri. By a gentleman direct from Fort Leavenworth, we learn that some 600 negroes from Florida, and runaways from the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and from the whites, united with a few Indians, and perhaps a few white men, have been gradually assembled in the fastnesses west of Arkansas. Not long since they march high up Red river and camped for the purpose of hunting buffalo. The buffalo were the valuable fur with logs, and were killed with a difficulty protect themselves against all dangers? They caught but few buffalo, and therefore to supply their wants, invaded the possessions of the Choctaws and carried off cattle, poultry, grain, &c. The Choctaws followed, but finding their numbers and fortifications an overmatch, the retired and sent to Fort Gibson for the U. S. dragoons. Capt. Moore of company D, was sent to capture them with three companies of dragoons, but after arriving upon the Red river, he found their entrenchments too strong, and their number too great to venture an attack. He accordingly sent to Fort Tawson and was reinforced with a fine company of infantry and a couple of pieces of cannon.

"The cannon were shortly brought to bear upon the works and soon made the splinters fly and the log move so quickly, that the refugees, at a signal rushed outside of their fortifications and began to form upon the prairie in front of their works. Ere they fully succeeded in doing so, Capt. Moore and his gallant dragoons charged upon them at full gallop. The enemy that ensued is represented as terrific—the dragoons routed them in all directions, and, after putting large numbers to the sword, succeeded in capturing the remainder. The conduct of the dragoons is represented as worthy of all commendation as regards both skill and bravery. The bravery and numbers of the refugees availed absolutely nothing against the irresistible charge of the mounted dragoons.

"This decisive blow will give security to the exposed portion of our frontier and convince the lawless negroes and Indians that our dragoons may not be trifled with. The loss of the dragoons was unknown to our informant—he said an express brought the news to the fort."

THE NAVY.

The U. S. frigate Macdonald, commander James Wilkinson, and sloop-of-war Warren, commander Wm. Jamieson, arrived at Boston on Wednesday morning from Pensacola, having left that port on the 9th instant, and anchored of the navy yard. "The Macdonald looks as if she had met with distressing times, and her general external appearance, with her 'slump' main topgallant mast, although decorated with a broad pennant, is more like an old English transport than a crack American frigate. Boston harbor presents a warlike aspect. There are at anchor in the stream two eighty gun ships, a frigate a sloop-of-war and a government schooner. On Tuesday commander Hull benighted down his pennant on board the Ohio, and the ship is to be immediately taken into the navy yard, and those of the crew whose term of service has expired, will be paid off. If the Macdonald had arrived on Tuesday, the novel spectacle would have been presented of three broad pennants, (the blue, the red, and the white), in the same squadron of ships; viz: the Pennant of com. Hull, on board the Ohio; of com. Down on board the Columbus, and of com. Wilkinson, on board the Macdonald. We believe that a case has never occurred in our navy where three commodors, commanding squadrons, have hoisted their pennants in the same port at the same time."

IMPLEMENTS OF WAR. In the National Register of October last, volume 50, page 187, we inserted extracts from English papers relative to some wonderful powder water to have been discovered by a Mr. Warner, and the effects of which was by him exhibited to sundry high officers and scientific persons in the confidence of the British government, who the accounts stated were perfectly astonished at the result. Whether this discovery has relation to some new and more destructive concentration or development of the properties of gunpowder or of its application to projectiles—or whether it be some new combination that is destined to astonish mankind and revolutionize the whole system of war as was the consequence which followed the discovery of gunpowder, we have scrutinized all the publications that have yet come to our hands upon the subject without being able to detect. That something of vast magnitude is involved in the discovery, would seem to be clearly indicated by what recently passed in the British parliament when ministers were called upon for information relative thereto.

"House of commons, June 16th, 1841. Mr. Warner's invention. Mr. Wakley said that, seeing the noble lord the member for south Staffordshire in his place, he wished to put the question to him if he had given notice; and, in order that the house might understand the case, he hoped they would extend to him their indulgence for a few moments. In August, 1840, an editorial notice appeared in the Times newspaper, stating that a discovery had been made of great consequence, and which, in the opinion of certain gentlemen, was calculated to effect, in no ordinary degree, all future warfare on the face of the civilized globe. It was represented to be the discovery of a power of such vast magnitude, that the writer could scarcely at first believe such a thing in existence; but he challenged inquiry, and in the article alluded to gave an account of the proceedings which had taken place in relation to the subject before his majesty William IV and the lords of the admiralty. It appeared that subsequent investigations were made into the nature of the discovery, and that the circumstances were brought under the consideration of the prime minister, lord Melbourne, who referred the case to the lords of the admiralty, and requested that an inquiry might be instituted. The notice which appeared in the Times in August was followed by three others in September, from which time the matter seemed to have rested till February, 1841. During that month another notice appeared in the Times, and an account was given of an experiment said to have been performed on a sheet of water on the property of Mr. Boyd, in Essex. He would read the first of the article alluded to. It stated that an experiment was tried, on Saturday afternoon, of one of the inventions to which we alluded last autumn, which a friend on whom we have reliance had an opportunity of witnessing. The trial took place on the ground of Mr. Boyd, in the county of Essex, a few miles from town, in the presence of sir Robert Peel, sir George Murray, sir Henry Hardinge, sir F. Biddell, lord Ingestre, colonel Curwood, captain Britten, captain Webster, and some other gentlemen."

The report went on to state that a boat, weighing two and a half tons, and filled with five and half tons of solid timber, crouched and clamped together with iron spikes, was set in motion; and on a signal from the inventor was to use the words of the reporter, "instantaneously scattered into a thousand fragments." The report further states that the arrangements had all been under the inspection of captain Britten, and that Mr. Werner, the inventor, never went near the workmen employed. He had stated what he believed to be the marrow of the question. It was a discovery of such vast importance to the maritime power of this country, and as regarded the interests of humanity, that he thought both the house and the country had a right to be informed on the subject. If such a power really existed, and could be used, he might almost say war would be at an end, for no one would expose themselves to the certainty of being destroyed. The noble lord having witnessed the experiment he (Mr. Wakley) wished to know whether the account given of it in the Times, and repeated by Mr. Wakley, a gentleman of undoubted veracity, was to be considered as true and entitled to public credence?

Lord Ingestre said, in answer to the question of the honorable member for Finsbury, he would state shortly to the house his opinion of the experiment alluded to. He regretted very much that the subject had been noticed either in a newspaper, in a pamphlet, or in that house, because he considered that a discovery of such vast importance ought to be kept as secret as possible. He had known of the invention for upwards a twelvemonth, and his attention was first accidentally called to it by a paragraph in a newspaper. At first it struck him that there was something behind the announcement of the discovery, that more was meant by it than met the eye; but he could not guess from what he had witnessed, that he was convinced that the discovery was one of the greatest importance. He would have hesitated, perhaps, to have stated this, had it merely been his own opinion; but when such distinguished officers as admirals King and Hardy—now no more—had left their opinions of the discovery recorded on paper, he had no hesitation in giving his opinion to the house.

He had further to state, that at his solicitation sir G. Murray had gone to witness the second experiment, and that he was particularly struck, as, indeed every body must be, with the immense power contained in so small a compass. That gallant officer had since had communication with the inventor, and had informed him (lord Ingestre) that he had been with the first lord of the treasury, and had received the assurance of lord Melbourne that an inquiry would be instituted into the merits of the discovery. The inventor had been now for ten years endeavoring to impress the government of this country with the importance of his invention, and during that period he had struggled with the severest difficulties rather than accept the tempting offers of foreign governments, being determined that so powerful an engine should not be lost to his own country. He had frequently urged these considerations on the first lord of the treasury, and also that it could easily be ascertained whether or not the instrument was worth having. It was cruel to the individual and unjust to the country that the matter had long since been decided on.

Sir Francis Bordaet having been a witness in the experiments, would say that he had never seen anything more astonishing, nor had he ever conceived that anything so small and trifling, in comparison to its effects, could ever have been invented. An immense fabric of wood-work, strongly clamped together with iron, at the distance of two or three hundred yards scattered into fragments. Foreign governments were anxious to secure this invention, which so far exceeded all others for the same purpose; but he hoped one effect of this discussion would be to secure it for this country.

Mr. Brotherton was quite willing to give encouragement to all persons who invented engines for increasing the industry or augmenting the happiness of the people, but he must protest against any encouragement being held out to the invention of engines which he considered to be injurious to the peace and welfare of society. It might be said that the invention of these machines would put an end to war (heat, and cheers,) but he doubted that. War was a remnant of barbarism, and ought to be discouraged by a civilized state in all possible ways.

The subject then dropped, and the house adjourned at six o'clock.

In noticing the above debate, the New York Courier starts a question whether Walker, the inventor, or whether ROBERT L. STEVENS, one of our own countrymen, and who is now in England, is not the real author of the discovery.

The Courier states that "during the last war, Mr. STEVENS constructed a shot, which, on experiment, proved fully as powerful and destructive as that to which allusion has been made in the house of commons. It was offered for sale to government, who appointed a commission consisting of commodores ROSSA, CHAMBERS, and we believe MONROE, of our navy, in report upon its merits. Under their superintendence, a structure was raised on governor's island of solid timber, some fifteen feet square, and clamped together with iron spikes, which the inventor in question on the first discharge instantaneously scattered into a thousand fragments." Upon this, the government paid Mr. STEVENS twenty-five thousand dollars for his discovery, but peace following almost immediately afterwards, no opportunity offered for testing it by actual practice. A number of the shot were however made by Mr. STEVENS and delivered to government. These have been lying about in our navy yards and arsenals, and it is very likely that from some of them the Englishman obtained the secret which he now offers to the British government. Had the U. S. ship President been detained a little longer before she sailed at the close of the last war, she would probably not have fallen into the hands of the British armada which captured her, as Mr. STEVENS was on his way to board her, with some of his shot, and only arrived half an hour too late."

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

Large meeting in the Park to re-nounce against the passage of a national bank law.

A very large and respectable meeting of all classes of the citizens of N. York, was held in front of the city hall, last night, to re-nounce against the assumption of power by congress, to create a national bank.

There must have been between 2,000 and 3,000 persons present, although the call was not signed by any one; and the meeting was only considered preliminary to a much larger one, that will be called in a few days by the old and young men's committees. We observed among the crowd a great number of individual men, who have usually acted in concert with the whig party on all political subjects, and several ex-whig aldermen, &c. &c.

The meeting was called to order by the appointment of GEORGE BRYCE, a wealthy silver-smith, to the chair; and Mr. HUNT as secretary.

Mr. F. C. Treadwell, the author of the "letter to Daniel Webster," read a long and very calm and able written remonstrance against the proposed bank law, from which we can only find room for the following passages:

The advocates of the power of congress "to grant charters of incorporation," have long since retired from the field of argument. A few bold assertions upon the authority of two of the writers of the Federalist, of Hamilton and Jay, for Madison was against them, and a determination to establish a bank at all hazards, in bold defiance of the constitution, and of the voice of the people through their trumpet, the ballot boxes, is all that is now heard of this advocate of the power to charter banks. If the exercise of this power betray an utter want of confidence in the justice of their cause, it must be admitted that they exhibit no small degree of instinctive prudence in the management of it. The opinions of Hamilton, once so potent, so conclusive with the trainbands of his admirers, have entirely lost their charm, and are seldom quoted for any other purpose than to show how easily they may be refuted. For instance, he maintained that congress might charter a bank for the purpose, or, the other way, of a loan of money, provided the lenders should demand such a consideration or condition, in order to put them into credit. They themselves have little or no money to lend, and this bank charter is indispensable to the credit, to give the "bill of credit" which it allows them to emit, sufficient circulation to draw in and absorb the means of those who have money, and thereby enable those who have none, to become the bankers of the government! The abolition of borrowing money of men who have no money; of legislating into credit by a special act which congress has no constitutional power to pass, a knot of broken down political gamblers, bankrupts, stock jobbers and trade-fallen bankers, who have secured the lobbies of the government, and of the skirts of the treasury, has no parallel but in the political and financial circles of the Hamilton school.

When congress borrow money they must borrow it as the constitution prescribes, on the credit of the U. S. and not on the credit of all the money they can get; nor land credit; they cannot borrow money on conditions which the constitution does not authorize them to make. The bankers having obtained corporate conditions, may demand others. They may say their charters is not safe from repeal.

Wherefore, this meeting earnestly re-nounce against the assumption of the power by congress "to grant charters of incorporation," either for the creation of a national bank, or any other such measure, such powers being among those "not delegated to the U. States."

After this was read, and responded to by loud, long and continued cheering, the remonstrance was unanimously adopted.

The following resolutions were offered by John H. Hunt and adopted by acclamation:

Whereas, the president of the U. S. in his recent message to congress, has declared that in vetoing the renewal of the charter of the late U. S. bank, president Jackson was "fully sustained in the course he had taken by the popular voice," and has further admitted that in the election of his successor, and in other subsequent elections, the chartering of any similar institution was disapproved by the people.

And, whereas, the president declares that he has no means of determining what is now the judgment of his constituents upon matters of finance, but by appealing to their appointed immediate representatives, and, therefore, the prominent measures now before congress, namely, the creation of a national bank, or corporate "fiscal agent," and its adjuncts, the "loan bill" and the "distribution bill," (the one to borrow money for the U. S. treasury, the other to give public money away) appear to have been brought before congress through the influence of foreign bankers and stock-jobbers, their agents, confederates and counsellors; for they were not made test questions, and were not publicly avowed by any party at the late elections, when the present advocates of these measures studiously concealed their designs, if such designs they then entertained.

And, whereas, it is all-important that a government founded on the popular will, and directly amenable thereto, should frequently receive from their own lips the sentiments and instructions of the people: Therefore,

Resolved, That congress has no constitutional power to charter a national bank, or any other measure, for the incorporation of a bank, or the creation of a "fiscal agent," or any other name or disguise whatever.

Resolved, That a national debt is a national curse, which, if submitted to as a resource in time of war, ought never to be contracted in time of peace.

Resolved, That the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands or any other branch of the national revenue among the several states, for the purpose of increasing the price and stimulating the sale of state bonds, would be a virtual assumption of such bonds, and a palpable violation of the federal constitution.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the government of the U. States by a wise and prudent foresight, so to husband its resources in time of peace as to make the most effectual preparation for war; and that when, as is now the case, our country is menaced on every side, from the Atlantic, from the Pacific, from the St. Lawrence, from the Niagara, when on the ocean our flag is insulted, when our ships are captured by British cruisers, and the peaceable inhabitants of our frontier villages are assassinated in their beds, or murdered while flying unarméd from midnight assassins; when our lives and liberties are publicly justified by the British government; and when the bankers of this colossal power, to whom we owe nothing, have their agents in the lobbies of the capital, clamoring for our money and our lands, we should be reverent to our duty—revert to the U. S. constitution, and our rights, and we did not call on our government in all its branches, to keep in its own hands all the means it possesses, and to be at all times prepared to resist such a course of oppression.

Resolved, That the assumption put forth by certain office holders of the legislative class, that they can take from the people the right to repeal odious laws of their making for 20, 30, or any other number of years, is an atrocious insult to those from whom they derived their power as representatives; and we here solemnly declare, that should congress and the president sanction the odious measures now sought to be fastened upon the country—measures which no party had the boldness to publicly avow at the late elections—we will vote for no future representative who is not unequivocally pledged to effect their repeal.

Resolved, That this meeting approves of the appeal made by the president in his late message, to the people of the U. States through their immediate representatives, for the purpose of obtaining their judgment on questions of finance; and our delegates are hereby instructed to call on him with a copy of the proceedings of this meeting, and to solicit his especial attention to the same, and to give explanations of the views of the people as he may require or desire.

Resolved, That we recommend the people of the United States to meet in their primary assemblies, and respond to the appeal of the president by giving a full expression to their views upon the important measures proposed for the action of the general government.

After which alderman Purdy offered the following, which was carried amid the most enthusiastic applause:

Resolved, That should congress pass an act for the creation of any national bank, we, the people here assembled, pledge ourselves on to the other, to cease not in our exertions until its charter is repealed. Let then our rallying cry be, repeal! repeal! repeal!!! and we earnestly call upon the whole intelligence of our beloved country to come to the rescue, and preserve, sustain and defend the constitution from the assaults of its violators.

The first speaker was a venerable looking old gentleman—who denounced the course of Henry Clay as selfish, and denigrated to the welfare of all the industrious classes—said that his conduct was mean in the extreme—that he was acting thus from disinterested motives—that he was not only legislating to put money in his own pocket, but was persevering and endeavor to displace John Tyler at the end of three years, and seat himself in the presidential chair. (This rally was received with great cheering.) He trusted in God, however, that John Tyler would remember (loud cheering) the views of the whole people, and not merely of the miserable, broken down, disappointed faction, at whose head Henry Clay placed himself. (Cheering.) He hoped that John Tyler would listen to the respectful remonstrance of some of his fellow citizens of N. York, and veto the bank bill, if it passed both houses. (Uproarious cheering.) And, if he did, he, for one, which, though he believed him to be, would vote for him for the next president of the U. States. (Loud and continued cheering.) John Tyler stood by the people without respect to party, the people would stand by him. (Cheers on cheers, and some dissenting.) And he would be elected president by the most tremendous majority ever given to any man.

Major DAVEC was called for loudly, and came forward, though in feeble health. He said, the people generally, without respect to party, all over the state of New York, had determined peaceably and legally to free themselves from the burden of Clay's bank bill, if it passed. The great word "repel" would ring through the south, as he well knew; and through the north and west the cry of "repel!" "repel," would rise, till it overwhelmed the advocates of the bank bill. Mr. Clay might throw himself in the breach, but he would be overwhelmed, and as a political man he never could rise again afterwards. It is far safer to let the people have both houses, I believe there is moral courage enough left in John Tyler to veto it, although Mr. Clay stands ready to bully him out of his resolution, if possible. If Mr. Clay succeeds in compelling the president to sign it, I hope the people will resist it if it comes. If its capital should be taken up, (and God only knows who will be got to take the stock) and the notes are issued, let not one of you keep one of their notes in your pockets for three hours; but take it to the branches which are to be shut in the states against our consent, and ask the bank officers to give you money for the bills. (Tremendous cheering, and cries of "we will—we will—by heavens we will!") They can't delegate, legally, those powers to corporations which Mr. Clay proposes to delegate. They might as soon delegate the power to command the army and navy to a corporation; and John Tyler has too much sense not to be aware of this fact. (Cheers.)

Mr. Clay cannot tell the most ridiculous blunders in matters of finance that ever were heard of. A school boy would be ashamed of some of his statements; they are unworthy of an answer. He would not pay the directors—oh, not but he could give them a dollar better to tell the truth than to lie. There are let each have $10,000; there are to be 200 directors; and of the 200 not one would ever pay bank a cent of the loan. (Tremendous cheering.)

You have been taunted as agrarians, and wanting to take property from the rich to give to the poor. Alas! you want to be the rich not to put their hands in your pockets and take away your hard earnings, which they are trying to do by Clay's odious bank bill. All the bank projects are bad enough, but Clay's is the most monstrous and vicious of the whole lot. (Tremendous cheering.)

I heard the bank men outside the crowd say this meeting would be a failure. (Laughter.) A failure! Why, this is a spontaneous meeting—called together by no party, and no party is to be seen—and here are nearly three thousand persons and they call this a failure. (Cheers and roars of laughter.) But we can fill this park, if we please, (cheers)—and we will. (Loud cheers.) We shall fill all the domes and the great hall of Congress, (tremendous cheering)—the Tyler whigs (cheers); for already the whigs of the city are divided into two bodies—the Tyler whigs and the Clay whigs, (loud cheers), and the desertions from the Clay ranks are getting more numerous every day—(loud cheers). He soon will not have a corporal's guard left. (Cheers and laughter.) "My black boy, Charles," will soon constitute the whole of his rank and file. (Cheers and roars of laughter.) For it is very evident that, as two stars cannot shine in one hemisphere, so John Tyler and Henry Clay cannot both rule this great nation. (Cheers.) With Mr. Clay it is, and Caesar, out! He must play first fiddle, or he will play no fiddle at all. (Laughter.) And if he plays, he wants the people to "pay the piper." (Cheers.)

But we will have a meeting here, when the old flag waves from the hall, that shall astound the stockjobbers. The people who are the columns of the commonwealth will go to the aid of the pillars of majesty, as the lion from the swiftness of Jordan. The stockjobbers, the speculators, the lobby men—they are the vermin of the body politic. (Cheers.) I have connections numerous among the whigs; they tell me not to fear those who are called the Clay whigs. My fellow citizens, their love might do me harm—but their hatred would be a blessing on my grey head. (Tremendous cheering.) They know I love Andrew Jackson. I do not care to fight by his side. No! I do not care for his conduct there—I love him because he vetoed the bank bill. (Tremendous cheering.) And if John Tyler has the courage—and I believe he has—to veto Clay's bill, the blessing of the nation will be old and young, rich and poor, man, woman and child, will ring round his heart and home, his head and his hearth-stone, till the latest hour of his life. [The enthusiastic cheering that followed this burst, was truly terrific and deafening for some minutes.]

It does not, the cry of "repel!" will ring from one and of the union to the other. The great people are ready—the calm north—the chivalrous south, the adventurous west—and the enterprising east—will all be ready to repel Clay's odious and treasonous bank bill if it passes. (Cheers.) The good sword of the people will cut the Gordian knot asunder; peaceably always peaceably!—(Cheers.) Not as our antagonist said before the election, "for any day we may!" Not so! Never forcibly, my friends! (Cheers.)

Mr. Clay seems determined to be the great I AM. He distributes the public lands—he creates a bank, he says it shall pass—he creates a loan—he calls it a contract. Yes such a contract as the lion made. The lion distributed a quantity of plunder in three shreds—he took one share because of the power of his name—the lion! [Mr. Clay is the lion of the west—he takes one share for that]. Well, the lion claimed the second share, because he was the strongest and strongest beast in the place, and boasted of more power than the rest. [So with Mr. Clay in the senate]. "Aod, then," said the lion, "there is one share left, to be sure: I don't exactly insist that it is mine; but let me see the beast that dares to touch it, and I'll tear him to pieces." (Cheers.) And so it is with Mr. Clay and his contracts. He is the lion, and claims the lion's share. [Loud cheers and laughter.]

And now, my friends, I leave you. And now I call on you, solemnly in this noble Park, here beneath the broad, bright canopy of Heaven, in the face of you sun, which, setting in his golden radiance seems to smile upon our meeting to give three cheers to these beautiful cheers—the Almighty God may hear and reward to you that all-wise Ruler over all may bless John Tyler, as he did the good old hero of New Orleans and give him moral firmness to veto the bank bill. specie payment throughout the country, ought to cost unavoidable delay to be resumed. That a currency of uniform value is indispensable to the practical regulation of commerce between the states, and with foreign countries—would restore the public finances; stimulate the industry of the people; renew their mutual confidence; facilitate the beneficial exchange of their agriculture, mechanical, manufacturing and commercial products; increase their enterprise at home and abroad; and restore to the nation industry, prosperity and happiness from which it has fallen. We therefore earnestly from congress, the adoption of the present action, of such measures, as will secure to the country the benefits we have enumerated.

2. Resolved, That gold and silver being confessedly insufficient for the business of the American people, are not, and cannot be, "hard" money. That whatever is the medium of purchase and sale—in which state banks is now chiefly employed—is the money of the country; and that the constitutional power to "regulate the value" of "money" comprehends the right to equalize the value of the notes of the state banks.

3. Resolved, That the legitimate mode of obtaining these desirable ends, is the establishment of a national bank; clothed with all powers necessary to displace all other banks, and the adoption of such measures as may be necessary for securing the benefits to be derived from such an institution.

4. Resolved, That the absence of such an institution, private enterprise, activity and prosperity notwithstanding, has been the cause of the depression of credit have been diminished, and individual and national embarrassment have prevailed; whilst the establishment by congress of a national bank, has in each case revived the public finances, quickened the industry and enterprise, and enlarged the business and prosperity and happiness of the country.

5. Resolved, That the constitutional power to create a national bank, such as heretofore existed, has been often sanctioned by successive Congresses, by the representatives of the states and of the people, and by the judiciary, that we cannot regard it as an open question. That the constitution was intended as an honest, and a practical thing—suited to the wants and interests of a great people—and to be administered on permanent principles, of an invasion of which the supreme court of the United States was in the last resort to the arbiter. That to unsettle by congressional construction to day, what had been settled by the wisdom of legislative, executive and judicial determination, is to weaken the foundations of our government and make it the puppet of dreams, theory and visionary abstraction.

6. Resolved, That we are in favor of the creation at the present session of congress, of a bank with the power to establish branches in the several states and territories—that we regard the granting of such power as within the constitutionally defined authority of the federal government—that it is one of the principal characteristics of its nationality; is looked for by the large mass of the people, and highly important to the great practical ends for which such an institution is desired.

7. Resolved, That a creation of a bank of the United States, by the first congress elected under the constitution, many of whose members belonged to the convention which framed that instrument—in the approbation subscribed to the charter by the same convention, and in the sanction of the sanction granted by president Jefferson, an act passed by successive republican congresses, for the negotiation of loans from that bank—for extending its branches into the territories and dependencies of the United States, and for the purpose of securing imprisonment and had labor, any longer or counter of the notes of the bank—in the approval by president Madison, of the act passed by a republican congress incorporating the second bank; and in the uniform and consistent policy of the United States, composed of judges Marshall, Washington, Johnson, Livingston, Dural and Story, declaring the bank and its branches to be constitutionally created, we find ample warrant for a faith on this subject not to be destroyed or weakened.

8. Resolved, That while we honor all the whigs in congress, who have been faithful to the expectations which prompted their election, our thanks are preeminently due to that "noblest Roman of them all," Henry Clay, of Kentucky. His conduct under our triumph has been characteristic harmony with former professions, and fits to overdoing the measure of his country's confidence, admiration and gratitude.

9. Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be signed by the officers of this meeting, and be forwarded to the president of the United States, and to both houses of congress.

THE GREAT MEETING IN NEW YORK.

On the 6th inst., the great meeting of the whigs of the city of New York, assembled in canal street to express their deliberate opinions in favor of a national bank with power to establish branches wherever they may be deemed necessary. The number present, it is estimated, was at from four to ten thousand. The Courier says:

Never was there greater unanimity of opinion exhibited at a public meeting; and if the voice of the people has any weight at Washington, there will be prompt action on the subject of a national bank, and Mr. Clay's bill for giving to a national bank national powers—those rights and powers without which it would be useless incumbrance of the statute books—will become the law of the land.

The meeting being organized, a teller was read from ex-governor Poinsett, in which he declined the invitation given to him to address the meeting, but avowed his entire concurrence with the objects of the meeting.

The following resolutions were then unanimously adopted, and with long continued cheers.

1. Resolved, That the unequal value of the bank paper of the several states—depreciated in degree varying in the different sections of the country, is a stain on public and private credit—injurious to the morals of the community, and opposed to the principles of the federal constitution. That the power is given to congress by that instrument, to regulate the value of the currency, and to make uniform the existing depreciated currency can only be regulated and made uniform, by the exercise of a power for that purpose by the general government. That

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

July 29. Mr. McDon presented the memorial of Monsieur Alfon, in relation to his system of telegraphing, which was referred to his committee on military affairs.

Mr. Mangum from the committee on naval affairs, reported the bill from the house for the establishment of a home squadron, without amendment.

The house bill to provide for the navy pensions, with an amendment to strike out the second section.

This bill having been taken up in committee of the whole; Mr. Mangum explained the object of his committee in striking out the second section.

After some remarks from Messrs. Woodbury, Williams, Huntington, Mangum and Calhoun, Mr. Woodbury moved to amend the second section by inserting after the words "who receives pay"—"As an officer in the service which he may be engaged during the year, so that no officer shall receive pay at the same time both as a pensioner and an officer in service."

This amendment was discussed by Messrs. Mangum, Clay, Alabama, Lincoln, Buchanan, Prentiss, Johnson, Huntington, Williams, Berrien and others, when the question was taken on the amendment and carried, 21 yeas, 18 nays.

Mr. Mangum now expressed the hope that the second section would be stricken out in accordance with the view of the committee.

The striking out was opposed by Messrs. Buchanan and Pierce and rejected, yeas 19, nays 23.

Mr. Woodbury then moved to further amend the bill by adding to the first section the following:

"He decided that no part of this money shall be applied to the payment of any pensioners not entitled under the acts of congress as they expired prior to the year 1837."

Mr. Walker desired to keep the act of 1834 in force. He felt it a duty to see that the law granting pensions to widows for five years after the death of their husbands should be continued in force. He would therefore move to amend the amendment by inserting the following:

"As provided also, that the pensions authorized under the act of the 30th June, 1834, be, and the same are hereby, continued in force until otherwise directed by law."

This proposition was debated by Messrs. Williams, Walker, Pierce, Sevier, Buchanan, Mangum, Clay, Woodbury and others, when the further consideration was postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. Merrick then moved to take up the bill for the renewal of the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, which had been reported with an amendment. This motion was agreed to.

After the bill had been discussed for some time, the further consideration was postponed to go into executive session; and, after some considerable time spent therein, the senate adjourned.

July 30. Mr. Barrow presented a memorial from citizens of Louisiana against the extension of the limits of the port of New Orleans.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. Allen submitted a resolution to the effect that all executive business should be transacted with open doors except when the senate is engaged with treaties. Except as having been made to its consideration, it lies over one day.

The joint resolution for the distribution of seven hundred copies of the digest of patents was taken up and passed.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill relating to the renewal of the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia. The motion pending being the amendment offered by Mr. Beaumont to limit to the 1st of March next the power to pay out or lend out notes of other than specie paying banks.

Mr. Wright addressed the senate at some length. He denied that the District required the aid of banks in the transaction of its business; that its condition was never more prosperous than at present, when there were more business buildings than at any former period when the banks were in full operation. He thought he could do better without banks than with them; particularly banks that issued irredeemable paper; which, he really believed, were the veriest curses that could be inflicted on any community.

A few minutes were for the "benefit of the people." The first paper he saw in the shape of a memorial was from the directors of those banks to renew their charters for the benefit of the people; but the people—the honest mechanic and laborer—did not ask it. He hoped the amendment of the senator from Georgia would not prevail.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, Williams, Woodbridge—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, of Indiana, Wright, Young—18.

Mr. Merrick then moved to add to the first section a clause which would enable the banks of the District to issue notes of the denomination of one and two dollars.

This proposition was debated at some length by Messrs. Walker, Merrick, Allen, Tappan and others, when the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Fulton, Graham, Linn, Mouton, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Ind., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, Young—23.

Mr. Merrick then moved to restore the fourth section of the bill, which had been stricken out in committee of the whole, wherein the bill was last before the senate, some weeks since.

On this motion a debate arose, in which Messrs. Benton, Walker and Merrick participated.

The vote was then taken on the motion, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, Young—16.

Mr. Merrick then moved to introduce a section to the bill providing for the extension of a charter to the Union Bank of Georgetown until the year 1847, for the purpose of winding up its concerns. Which motion was adopted.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Young—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Calhoun, Clay, Linn, Nicholson, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, Young—17.

The bill to incorporate the Mechanics' Relief Society of the town of Alexandria was taken up, and, at the suggestion of Mr. King, laid on the table for the present.

The bill making appropriation for the support of paper Janitors in the District of Columbia was taken up; and, after having been discussed by Messrs. Merrick, Tappan, Wright, Calhoun, Sevier and others, the bill was ordered to a third reading by the yeas and nays.

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Evans, Kerr, King, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge, Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bates, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Dixon, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholson, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—17.

The land bill then came up as the general order; when Mr. Saunders, of Indiana, said he did not design to call up the bill during the present week, but some time later in the ensuing one.

The bill to establish a home squadron was then taken up; when Mr. Benton moved an amendment relating to the adoption of American water-stocked boats for the use of the same.

This led to a discussion, in which the relative merits of American and Russian hemp, and the process of rotting the same, were canvassed. The amendment, however, was not adopted; and the bill as it came from the house was finally read a third time by the yeas and nays.

The senate then adjourned over to Monday.

August 2. Memorials and petitions were presented and referred, as follows:

By Mr. Wright from the chamber of commerce of the city of New York, against the passage of the revenue bill, in the present form. Also, from merchants and traders on the same subject; both which were referred to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed. Also, a remonstrance from citizens of Niagara, N. Y., against the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands; which was laid on the table.

By Mr. Buchanan a remonstrance from citizens of Philadelphia against the passage of a bankrupt bill. Which was laid on the table.

By Mr. Tallmadge, from inhabitants of Moriah, New York, for a bankrupt law, which was laid on the table. Also, from a large number of citizens of New York city in favor of a national bank; also, the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Rochester, New York, in favor of a bankrupt law; both which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed. Also, from four or five hundred citizens of New York, asking an increase of duties on watches, parts of watches, jewelry and pearls; which was referred to the committee on finance.

By Mr. King, of inhabitants of Alabama, intending to emigrate to Oregon, asking for protection from government, under our laws, when arrived there. The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Linn submitted a resolution requesting the president of the United States, under the resolution of 1827, to give notice to the British government, in order to put an end to the treaty for the joint occupation of the territory of Oregon west of the Rock mountains, which expires on one day.

By Mr. Evans, from inhabitants of Maine, in favor of a bankrupt law. Laid on the table.

By Mr. Clay from manufacturers of glass, against a duty on materials used in the manufacture of glass; which was referred to the committee on commerce.

By Mr. Miller. From hat manufacturers of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, against a duty on articles used in the manufacture of silk hats; which was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Calhoun presented the proceedings of a meeting in Cumberland county, Virginia, in relation to the unconstitutionality of this bank, and confiding that it was not only the right but the duty to repeal the charter as soon as a majority could be obtained; also remonstrating against the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, as the forerunner of the American system.

The memorial of Mr. Andrew was read, Mr. Henderson said the unconstitutionality of the bank had got to be a hackney phrase much more easily asserted than maintained by argument.

The debate was then continued on this subject between Mr. Andrew, Mr. Allen, Mr. Madison, Mr. Wood and Mr. Calhoun, when Mr. Archer rose to say that the people of Virginia, on mass, did not concur sincerely in any one opinion expressed in the memorial, and he would undertake to say they repudiated the idea of repeal.

Mr. Calhoun said he should be greatly mistaken if the people of Virginia, and a large portion of the people of the southwestern portion of the country, did not hold the same sentiments. He said it would be the most joyful act of his life to vote for the repeal. He had no idea that a party should saddle on the country a measure which would take up 21 years, when it was believed, and had been asserted, that the acts was unconstitutional, and dangerous to the liberties of the country.

Mr. Archer said that when neither his colleague nor himself had been made the organs of presentation of the proceedings of a meeting, it was to be regarded as presumptive evidence that it was not the voice of the people of Virginia which spoke. He could tell the gentleman that his nullifying doctrine would never prevail in Virginia. They were ready there, at all times, to repudiate such principles. They were as much against nullification as they were against abolition.

Mr. Calhoun thought time would show what were the sentiments of Virginia, and be looked with confidence to the result. Was this bank, surrounded by its satellites, to be fixed on the country, without the power of being removed? If the bank were, all the other measures would come of consequence—funded debt, protective tariff, &c.—measures destructive to liberty. He thought resistance to these measures was a cause as glorious as that of the revolution.

Mr. Tappan contended that it was incumbent on the friends of the bank, to prove the affirmative proposition of the constitutionality of this bank, and that need for discussion rested as yet on them.

Mr. Henderson said that the bank was such a subject was now brought forward, in the proposition that a bank was not constitutional, the burden of proof lay with the opponents of a bank.

The petition was then laid on the table and ordered to be printed. On motion of Mr. Wright.

Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taking proper measures for the distribution of the statistics of the 6th census now printing by the Government.

Mr. Linn submitted the following:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to give the notice to the British government which the convention of 1807 between the governments requires, in order to pay and to the treaty for the joint occupation of the territory of Oregon west of the Rocky mountains, and which territory is now possessed and used by the Hudson Bay company, to the ruin of the American Indian and for trade in that quarter, and conflicting with our inland commerce with the interior provinces of Mexico.

Mr. Allen's resolution relating to executive session being held with open doors, save when treaties were under consideration, was then taken up.

Mr. Allen said he would like to take the vote when there was a full session.

Mr. Clay suggested that some hour be fixed, when there could be a full attendance on both sides, and the simple vote be taken. If the subject should lead to a protracted discussion, he would feel it his duty to move to lay it on the table.

Mr. Allen said he had no particular desire to debate it; he meant, however, to offer some observations. It was not to be presumed that the vote on such a subject should be taken in silence. He would let it lie for the present, and would call it up either to-morrow or next day.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the bill from the house relating to duties and drawbacks was twice read, and referred to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, the bill to extend the time of issuing military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the revolution was twice read, and referred to the committee on public lands.

The bill to render the charter of the banks of the District of Columbia put on its third reading; when Mr. Mangum rose to move a reconsideration of the vote on the engrossment.

Mr. Benton hoped that some reasons would be given for the motion.

Mr. Mangum said there is a prohibition in the fifth section which forbids the banks to issue other denominations than notes of five dollars, while the banks in Virginia issued notes of six, seven, eight, nine and fifteen; which had to be placed in these banks on deposit.

The chairman of the committee for the District not being in his seat, the question on reconsideration was not taken.

The fortification bill was then taken up; when Mr. Preston rose and presented the object of the bill in a speech of some considerable length.

Messrs. Woodbridge, Linn, Sevier, Henderson and Evans participated in the debate and on the various amendments.

The following amendments were then severally concurred in:

"For surveys in reference to the military defences of the frontier, inland and Atlantic, thirty thousand dollars."

"For arrangements due for roads, harbors and rivers where public works and improvements have hitherto been made, and for the protection of public property now on hand at these places, and for arrears due for surveys and completing maps authorized by act of March 3, 1839, forty thousand dollars."

"For defraying the expenses of selecting and purchasing a site for the western or southern armory, to be selected by the president of the U. States, the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars."

Mr. Woodbury moved to amend the bill by inserting the sum of $50,000 for the defence of the river Piscataqua, considering that it was of as much importance in point of public property as any other, not excepting Boston itself. The amendment was lost.

Mr. Woodbridge spoke of the importance of placing the northern frontier in a proper state of defence, and went into the subject in detail.

Mr. White followed, contending also for the security of harbor defence, creation of harbors, &c. as part and parcel of the system of defence.

Mr. Sevier moved to amend the bill with instructions to amend the same by adding "the necessary appropriations for such forts and fortifications on the southwestern and northwestern frontiers as may be necessary and proper for the defence of the country." Mr. S. gave his reasons at length for the motion.

Mr. Young moved to amend the amendment by making the instructions general for the defence of the whole country.

Mr. White suggested a modification, which was accepted by Mr. Young, to insert after the word appropriations, "for such other ports, fortifications, harbors and military roads as may be deemed necessary for the defence of the western, northwestern and southwestern frontiers."

Mr. White explained at some length the object of the amendment.

The question was taken on its adoption, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, McRoberts, Porter, Smith, of Ind. Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Egan, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Miller, Phelps, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Ala., Southard, Walker—20.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Egan, King, Linn, Archer, Barrow, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Ind., Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Wright, Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Miller, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Southard, Walker—20.

Mr. Porter then moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $75,000 for the purchase of a site to erect an armory at or near Detroit, Michigan.

Mr. P. spoke at some length to show the importance of the ports which he had named.

Mr. Evans opposed the amendment on the ground that it could be attached to nothing which was introduced in the house, and not from any indisposition to vote for the appropriation.

The senate adjourned after a session of six hours, without taking the question on the amendment.

Tallmadge presented a petition of 103 citizens of New York in favor of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

The resolution of Mr. Allen to rescind the rule of the senate for the closing of their doors while in executive business, except when engaged on treaties, was taken up.

Mr. Allen advocated it, at some length. The business which was transacted in executive sessions, was, first, on treaties; and second, on nominations of public officers. When engaged on treaties with foreign powers, whose interests were adverse, and even hostile to ours, it might be of great importance that the progress of business should not be known until it was consummated. He therefore did not propose to rescind this portion of the rule.

But when engaged on the nominations of officers, whose character and actions for evil or for good deeply affected the interests of the people, there was no time for them, or agents of the people, to transact without their knowledge the business of their principals; but it was treating them as enemies. The people ought to be enabled to give their testimony as to the character of the multitudes of officers brought before the senate, the characters of many of whom it was impossible for them to be acquainted with; and the public examination would not injure the character of those who were worthy, while it would expose guilt and corruption.

Mr. Clay should not enter into this discussion; it was not a proper time—at an extra session of congress, and as they had some reason to hope, within two or three weeks of its termination. It might be shown that all reasons for secrecy, which applied to the case of treaties, were equally applicable to the case of nominations; that were this resolution adopted, their debates would be protracted to an unreasonable length—that exposures of individual character would be made that never ought to take place—that the attitude of the senate, to the nomination of the executive, and the whole world, would be of a most unpleasant character; but he would not go into the subject; he had risen to put an end, at this time, to this debate, and for this purpose he moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on this, he said the yeas and nays. The motion was carried, and the resolution laid on the table: yeas 28, nays 20.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the general order, being the bill to make appropriations for the erection of fortifications and the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities; the motion pending being the amendment of Mr. Porter "for defensive works and barracks and purchase of a site at or near Detroit, Michigan, $75,000."

It was typically advocated by Messrs. Porter and Woodbridge, showing the great importance at Detroit and its total want of defences. It was further debated at great length, by Messrs. Sevier, Benton, Buchanan and others.

Mr. Benton moved an amendment to the amendment to appropriate $100,000 for the construction of armed steamers and other vessels of government on Lake Erie.

This, after some discussion, was rejected without a division. The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. Porter, it was lost, by yeas 21 nays 24.

Mr. Sevier moved an amendment, to appropriate $80,000 for carrying on the military works at Fort Smith, Arkansas.

This, after some discussion, was adopted—yeas 19, nays 17.

Mr. Berrien moved an additional section to the bill, to appropriate $200,000 for the payment and indemnity of Georgia, for expenses incurred by that state, in calling out her militia, in case of emergency, for the suppression on Indian hostilities, for the protection of her inhabitants against sudden incursions of the Creek and Seminole Indians, and for the payment of claims of the state of Maine, for the service of her militia.

This was opposed by Mr. Preston and others as not in accordance with the design of the bill, which was for carrying on old works of defence, where most immediately needed.

Mr. Linn moved to amend the amendment by inserting a provision for the settlement of the accounts of the Missouri volunteers called into service in 1829 and 1838.

Messrs. Clay, of Ala. and Walker, gave notice, if the amendment was persisted in, that they should bring forward amendments, for the settlement of old claims of their respective states.

After some conversation, Mr. Linn withdrew his amendment, and moved to that appropriating $10,000.

Mr. Berrien was rejected—yeas 11, nays 27.

At a late hour, a motion for adjournment was made and failed. The bill was then reported to the senate when the amendments adopted in committee were severally reported to, so that appropriating $75,000 for the purchase of a site for a western or southwestern armory. This was modified at the suggestion of Mr. White by adding "or northwestern," as he had heard Pittsburgh named as a suitable place for its location.

Mr. Clay expressed his intention of voting against this amendment, as the reduced state of the treasury rendered it inexpedient to make this enormous appropriation.

Mr. Benton (who offered the amendment) was surprised at objections to it, at this late hour. Had he been aware of opposition, he could have produced a cart-load of documents, reports from departments, &c. In its favor, with which he should be prepared to defend this amendment, and for the purpose of not meeting an adjournment; but this being strongly opposed from various parts of the senate, he concluded by saying that the arguments he might be able to make would be of no avail, and he would merely call the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment.

After a few remarks by Mr. King, on his motion the senate adjourned.

August 4, Mr. Berrien presented a memorial of citizens of Augusta, Georgia, in favor of a bankrupt law, which was laid on the table.

Mr. Buchanan presented a remonstrance of glass manufacturers of Philadelphia, against an increase of duty on soda, ash, pipe-clay and other articles used in the manufacture of glass, stating that a levy of duties on these articles, as proposed by the revenue bill, would be destructive to their trade; which was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Smith, of Ind. from the committee on public lands, reported the house bill for the extension of military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the revolution.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, submitted a resolution inquiring of the commissioner of the general land office whether any clerks have been appointed by him, who was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, a resolution was adopted directing the secretary of the treasury to inform the senate the amount of Indian money, legacies or trust funds, which have been invested in state stocks, and the amounts in the respective states.

The fortification bill was then taken up, the question being on concurring with the amendment of the committee appropriating $75,000 for the purchase of a site for a western, southwestern or northwestern armory.

The amendment was advocated by Messrs. Benton and Preston, and opposed by Mr. Clay.

Mr. White moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words, "western, southwestern, northwestern army," and insert, "an army on the western waters."

Mr. King expressed doubt whether a location could be selected which would be satisfactory to all.

After further conversation by Messrs. White, Buchanan, Linn, Sevier, Preston, Tappan and Walker, as to the location of the site, Mr. White again amplified the amendment, so as to read "on the waters of the valley of the Mississippi." The amendment was rejected.

The question then being on concurring with the amendment of the committee, it was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Bates, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monahan, Nicholson, Porter, Preston, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Berrien, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Kerr, Miller, Morehead, Phelps—11.

Mr. Allen renewed the motion for amendment made yesterday by him, appropriating one hundred thousand dollars for the construction of armed elements, and such other vessels of war, on Lake Erie, as the president may think proper.

Mr. Allen advocated this amendment, as demanded for the defense of Lake Erie, and for the purpose of making our force equal to that of the British government, whose steamers were cruising about our coast prying into its exposed parts.

Mr. Preston opposed the amendment as irrelevant to the bill.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Porter, Allen and Woodbridge, when the question was taken, and the amendment adopted, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala. Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Ind. Sturgeon, Talmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Frost, Preston—11.

Mr. Porter renewed his motion for amendment, made yesterday, to appropriate fifty thousand dollars for defensive works at Detroit.

The amendment was advocated by Messrs. Porter, White and Preston.

Mr. Phelps offered an amendment to the amendment, to appropriate $75,000 for fortifications on the outlet of Lake Champlain.

After some remarks by Messrs. Phelps, Preston, Mangum and Prentiss, the question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, which was lost: yeas 16, nays 24.

The question then recurred on the amendment; which, after some conversation by Messrs. Linn and Sevier, was adopted: yeas 22, nays 17.

Mr. Talmadge offered an amendment, to appropriate for the purchase of site, and barracks, and defensive works at or near Buffalo, $60,000.

The amendment was rejected, after brief remarks by Mr. Woodbridge: yeas 18, nays 21.

Mr. Henderson offered an amendment, to increase the appropriation for defensive works from New Orleans from 50 to $150,000. He briefly advocated it, contending that the amount proposed for New Orleans in the bill was not proportionate to that proposed for other ports.

Mr. Barrow opposed this amendment. There was an unproporionate balance to those works, and no further appropriations were necessary till the regular session.

After brief remarks by Messrs. Preston and Henderson, the amendment was rejected: yeas 4, nays 33.

Mr. Woodbridge moved a reconsideration of the vote on the amendment providing for armed steamers.

Messrs. Woodbury, Wright and Allen, briefly opposed the reconsideration; and Mr. Woodbridge stated the reason which had induced him to make the motion, not being opposed to the amendment, but preferring that it be lost, to the loss of the whole bill.

The motion for reconsideration was rejected, yeas 23, nays 23.

Mr. Pierce said the amendments were disproportionate, part of the bill being applicable to a state of war, and the other to a state of peace. He moved to strike out a portion of the bill, with the amendments that had been adopted.

The president decided the motion out of order to strike out the amendments.

After some conversation on this point of order, the question was taken and carried on ordering the bill to engrossment for a third reading.

The senate adjourned at half past three o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, July 30. Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making appropriations for outfit and salaries of diplomatic agents, which was read twice, and referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Levy introduced a bill making further provision for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, which having been twice read, was, after some conversation between Messrs. Levy and Fillmore, referred to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Levy introduced a bill to provide for the relief and protection of the people of the United States against the Indian banditti infesting the territory of Florida and the state of Georgia.

And, having been read twice by its title, the bill, on motion of Mr. L., was referred to the committee on military affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Levy offered the following resolution, which lies over one day for consideration, and was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be required to furnish to this house the following information, to wit:

1. What sums have been expended in the execution of the treaty with the Seminoles nation of Indians, specifying the several items.

2. Whether any, and what, annuities are paid to the Seminoles nation of Indians.

3. Whether the whole tract of country designated in the supplemental treaty signed at Fort Gibson on the 9th of March, 1832, is now in the possession of said Seminoles nation of Indians.

4. What number of Indians and negroes have been emigrated from Florida since the date of said treaty.

5. What is the aggregate amount of expenditure which has been occasioned by the hostilities of said Seminoles Indians.

6. How many persons in the military service of the United States have been killed or wounded in the course of said hostilities; (including militia and regulars), and distinguishing the grades of the killed and wounded.

7. How many number of persons have been allowed in consequence of wounds received in the Florida service, or to the widows of persons killed in said service.

8. What is the regular army of the United States is now on duty in Florida, and under orders for that service.

Mr. Williams, of Maryland, from the select committee to whom had been referred the bill from the senate in relation to the census, reported the same with an amendment.

The bill on motion of Mr. W. was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. Pickens the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Cushing, of Massachusetts, in the chair), on the bill in relation to duties and drawbacks. The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Allerton, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Ballouett addressed the committee at length, but before he had concluded his hour expired, and he resumed his seat.

Mr. Ingersoll next took the floor and occupied it for an hour in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Pickens followed in opposition to the bill, until the expiration of his hour.

Mr. Hubbard next addressed the committee in remarks mainly of a statistical character.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Medill, Hastings and McKen in a half hour.

When Mr. Wise obtained the floor.

Whereupon the committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. W. W. Irwin then moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday by which the resolution providing that the revenue bill be taken out of committee at 12 o'clock to-morrow, (Friday), was adopted.

Pending this motion, the house adjourned.

Friday, July 30. The business first in order was the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. W. W. Irwin, to reconsider the vote of Wednesday last on the resolution providing that the revenue bill should be taken out of committee of the whole on the state of the union this day.

After a few words from Mr. Irwin, in explanation of the motive which had influenced him in submitting the motion, he withdrew the motion to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. Bell, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Cushing, of Massachusetts in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to duties and drawbacks.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Allerton to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Wise, (who was entitled to the floor), addressed the committee during the hour in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Fillmore obtained the floor, but yielded for a moment to Mr. Kim, who said that, having been called suddenly from the city, he could not be present when the vote was taken, but that he desired to say that, had he been present, he would have voted against the bill on the ground of its inadequacy. He regretted that he had not had an opportunity of explaining his views.

Mr. Fillmore then addressed the committee till the hour of twelve, when the house, in pursuance of its order of Wednesday last, proceeded, without further debate, to vote on the amendments.

The question was then taken by tellers, (Messrs. Broadman, and Allerton acting in that capacity), on the motion of Mr. Allerton to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, which motion, by yeas 82, nays 119, was rejected.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Lawrence to exempt from duty the articles of "tea and coffee."

Mr. Clifford moved to amend the amendment by adding "molasses, sugar and salt."

After some conversation on a point of order. The question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. Stields and Sellers acting), on the amendment to the amendment, which, by yeas 112, nays 84, was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Lawrence, as amended by the amendment of Mr. Clifford.

Mr. Ferris moved to add to the amendment, as amended, the article of foreign coal. Rejected.

The question was then taken by tellers, (Messrs. Weller and Brown acting). And the amendment as amended, by yeas 57, nays 112, was rejected.

Mr. Wise moved to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words (in the 43d line) "brass wire suited to the manufacture of pins;" which amendment, by yeas 120, nays not counted, was adopted.

Mr. Fillmore moved to amend the bill, in the third line, by striking out the words "from and after the date hereinafter mentioned;" and inserting the words "on and after the 1st day of September, 1841."

Mr. Roosevelt moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "September" and inserting January, if the amendment to the amendment was rejected. And the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Fillmore moved to amend the bill by adding, (in the 12th line), after the word "embroidery," the words "and laces of thread, silk or cotton."

Rejected.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the words "includog paste" were inserted in the 14th line after the word "jewelry."

Some amendments of phraseology, by way of transposition, were made, on motion of Mr. Fillmore.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the word "almonds" was struck out from line 38.

A great number of verbal amendments were offered by Mr. Fillmore, all of which were adopted.

Mr. Wise moved an amendment admitting certain specified articles free of duty till June, 1842. Rejected.

Mr. Pickens moved to amend the bill in the 6th line by striking out the words "raw hide."

The question was taken by tellers, (Messrs. James and Arrington acting), and, by yeas 53, nays 98, was rejected.

Mr. Williams, of Md. moved to strike out from the 53th line, all of which section of the bill, the words "raw unmanufactured."

A motion was made by Mr. Brewster to amend this amendment by inserting "tuckersburg, oscarburgs and buripia."

The amendment to the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Holmes moved to amend the original bill by striking out from the 60th line the words "juniper berries;" which amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKim moved an amendment exempting certain specified articles from duty until June 30, 1842. Rejected.

Mr. Hubbard moved to amend the bill in the 1st section after the word "jewelry," in the 11th line, by inserting the words "blankets of wool, the value whereof at the place whence exported shall not exceed seventy-five cents each." Rejected.

Mr. Hubbard moved to amend the first section, in the 14th line, by striking out the words "duty of" the word "twenty," and inserting the words "eighteen" so as to read "a duty of 18 per cent." Rejected.

Mr. Winslow moved to amend the bill by inserting in the 15th line, after the word "lead" the words "dry or." Agreed to.

Also, to insert "tallow" among the articles to remain at the existing duties. Lost.

Also, to insert "cassow" in the free list, also "type metal." Both lost.

And the motion being withdrawn, petitions and memorials were presented (under general consent) by the following gentlemen, and were referred appropriately:

Messrs. Kennedy, of Maryland, Linn Boyd, Hunt, Fillmore, Childs, Barnard, Gordon, Sumners, Hubbard, Talbot, Ingersoll, Stratton, Bismarck, Randall, of Maryland, Maxwell, Cross, Davis, of New York, P. G. Goode, of Ohio, and Wood, of New York.

Mr. Jones, of Md. on leave given, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making immediate provision for the defence of the Chesapeake bay by steam batteries.

Petitions and memorials were further presented by Messrs. Sergeant, Holmes, Wallace and Cranston.

On motion of Mr. Tillinghast, the house took up, on its first and second reading, the joint resolution from the senate on the speaker's table, providing for the distribution of 700 copies of the Digest of patents.

Mr. T. said, that, so the bill made a small appropriation, it would therefore be necessary that it be committed.

So, on this motion, the bill was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The following resolution, of which notice had been given, was offered by Mr. Oliver:

Resolved, That the rules of this house be so far amended that all amendments offered on committee of the whole, whether adopted in committee or not, upon the bill for the establishment of a local bank, shall be voted on in the house by yeas and nays, one-fifth of the members present voting for the same.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

After some conversation between Messrs. Fillmore, Briggs and Oliver, as to whether the resolution had been received or not, when it seemed to be conceded that the resolution was properly before the house; and the question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Fillmore, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 107, nays 84.

The speaker (by general consent) laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, covering estimates of the amounts of money required to carry into effect certain Indian treaties.

On motion of Mr. Proffit, the communication was referred to the committee of ways and means. Mr. Stoddard, of Massachusetts, then introduced a bill in relation to the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. John C. Clark, of New York, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate to incorporate the subscribers to a fiscal bank of the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. McClellan, of New York, to strike out the enacting clause thereof—

Mr. John T. Mason (who was entitled to the floor) addressed the committee, during the hour, in opposition to the bill.

[The committee rose informally, and the speaker resumed the chair, for the purpose of receiving a message from the president of the United States, by the hands of John Tyler, jr. his private secretary. After which, the chairman again took his seat].

Mr. Charles Brown, then took the floor, and spoke for the hour in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Washington, of N. Carolina, next addressed the committee in favor of the bill, and principally in reply to Mr. Stoddard, of the day previous.

Mr. Wood, of New York, followed in opposition to the bill and in reply to Messrs. Sergeant and Stuart, of Va.

Mr. Payne, of Alabama, also spoke at some length against the creation of a bank, and replied to Mr. Sergeant as to the historical evidence in favor of the constitutionality of the bank.

Mr. Davis having obtained the floor, the committee rose and reported progress, and thereupon the hour expired.

Wednesday, Aug. 4. Mr. Morgan called up for consideration the following resolution, heretofore offered by him:

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock meridian, on Friday next, the 6th instant, debate in committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the senate bill No. 8, shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on all amendments that may at that time be pending, and that may be offered, and shall then report the said bill to the house, with such amendments as have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, that nothing in this resolution shall preclude the committee from reporting the bill at any time prior to the time above specified.

And the resolution having been read, and the question being on its adoption, Mr. M. moved the previous question.

Mr. Morgan then modified his resolution, at the request, he said, of a number of gentlemen around him, so as to strike out "Friday" and insert "Tuesday."

And the question, "shall the resolution be adopted?" was then taken and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 55, nays 136: So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Sergeant rose and offered the following resolution which was read:

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock meridian on Friday next, the 6th instant, all debate in committee of the whole on the state of the union, on senate bill No. 8, shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on all amendments that may at that time be pending, and that may be offered, and shall then report and bill to the house, with such amendments as have been agreed to by the committee: Provided, that nothing in this resolution shall preclude the committee from reporting the bill at any time prior to the time above specified.

Mr. Gilder moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Sergeant asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, were as follows: yeas 96, nays 166: So the resolution was laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second. And the motion was sustained, that the main question should now be taken.

Mr. Ingersoll called the yeas and nays on the main question, (being on the adoption of the resolution), which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 104, nays 97: So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Sergeant moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, but waived the motion for the moment at the request of the speaker, who laid before the house a communication from the president of the United States, transmitting a communication from the treasury department, enclosing a communication from the French minister to the secretary of the treasury, relating to the commerce and navigation with France under existing treaties.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the communication and documents were referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house the following communication from the president of the United States, which was referred to the committee of ways and means, and ordered to be printed:

Washington, August 8, 1841.

To the house of representatives of the United States: On the 18th of February, 1832, the said representatives adopted a resolution in the following words:

"Resolved, That the president of the United States be authorized to employ Horatio Greenough, of Massachusetts, to execute, in marble, a full-length pedestrian statue of Washington, to be placed in the centre of the rotundo of the capitol, the head to be a copy of Houdon's Washington, and the accessories to be left to the judgment of the artist."

On the 23d of the same month, the secretary of state, by direction of the president, addressed to Mr. Greenough a letter of instructions for carrying into effect the resolution of the house.

On the 14th day of July, 1832, an appropriation of the sum of five thousand dollars was made to "enable the president of the United States to contract with a skillful artist to execute, in marble, a full-length statue of George Washington, to be placed in the centre of the rotundo of the capitol," and several appropriations were made in succeeding sessions in furtherance of the same object.

Mr. Greenough, having been employed upon the work for several years, at Florence, completed it some months ago.

A resolution of congress of the 27th of May, 1840, it was directed "that the secretary of the navy be authorized and instructed to take measures for the importation and erection of the statue of Washington by Greenough." In pursuance of this authority, the navy department held a correspondence with commander Hull, commanding on the Mediterranean station, who entered into an agreement with the owners or master of the ship "Sea" for the transportation of the statue to the United States. This ship, with the statue on board, arrived this day on the 31st ultimo, and now lies at the navy yard.

As appropriations have become necessary for the payment of the freight and other expenses, I communicate to congress such papers as may enable it to judge of the amount required.

JOHN TYLER.

The speaker also laid before the house the following communication from the president of the U. States, which was referred to the committee of ways and means, and ordered to be printed:

Washington, August 3, 1841.
Sir: I herewith transmit a communication received from the postmaster general, to which I would invite the attention of congress.

JOHN TYLER.

To the hon. John White, speaker, &c.
Sir: Post office department, August 2, 1841.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit the statement of the architect of public buildings, referring to the original estimate for the cost of the new general post office, and to the appropriations heretofore made for that purpose. The appropriation of the last session was all that was deemed necessary for the present year, being then supposed that the building could not be completed during the current session. As I have every confidence that it can be finished by the first day of December next, it becomes my duty to ask a further appropriation of seventy five thousand (75,000) dollars, being the balance of the original estimate. It is believed that this sum will be sufficient for the entire completion of the edifice.

I desire also to call the attention of congress to the estimate for erecting the out-buildings, iron railings, grading, paving and other contingencies including the purchase of a vacant lot in the rear of the building, which should belong to the government; and would suggest the propriety of adding a clause to the bill giving the power of applying towards the purchase of furniture any balance of these sums that may remain after the completion of the building and the other improvements contemplated. Respectfully, your obedient servant.

FRANCIS GRANGER.

To the president of the United States.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through John Tyler, jr. esq. informing the house that the president had approved and signed the bill seeking further appropriations for the maintenance of lunatic paupers in the District of Columbia.

The house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. John C. Clark of New York, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to a fiscal bank of the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. McClellan to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Davis (who was entitled to the floor) addressed the committee during the hour, mainly on the constitutional question, and referring, in the course of his remarks, to many high authorities.

Mr. Brown, of Tenn. followed in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Proffit delivered an eloquent and very animated speech.

He was succeeded by Mr. Milton Brown, who strongly advocated the passage of the bill.

Mr. Gamble followed on the same side of the question.

Mr. Marshall obtained the floor; but yielded to a motion of Mr. Stanley for the rising of the committee.

The question being put, no quorum voted.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the chairman reported that they had found themselves without a quorum.

Mr. Adams moved an adjournment.

Mr. Izard demanded the yeas and nays; which, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 17, nays 70. No quorum having existed—Mr. Weller moved a call of the house. The vote on his motion was: yeas 62, nays 22. Still no quorum voting.

The call thereupon proceeded, when 96 members answered to the names of the members of the house.

The absentees were called, when it appeared that 129 members were present.

A quorum thus appearing, the call was suspended.

Mr. Marshall now took the floor, but, instead of a speech, presented an apology to the house, on the ground of indisposition, and expressing his hope that he should be permitted to address the committee in the morning, yielded the floor to Mr. Weller who occupied his allotted hour in an earnest speech against the bill.

Mr. McKen next addressed the committee in a very animated speech, also in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Afford, of Georgia, succeeded in obtaining the floor, and went into a speech marked with his usual earnestness and touches of humor, which frequently occasioned merriment, and relieved a long and wearying debate.

Mr. Hubbard, of Virginia, rose, at eight o'clock, and addressed the committee in decided opposition to the bill.

Mr. Pope, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion for the rising of the committee; which motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported progress; and the house, at a little past 9 o'clock, adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

AGRICULTURE. We learn from the Kaneva Jeffersonian, that the governor of Virginia, in furtherance of a late act of the legislature, has appointed a board of agriculture, comprising five gentlemen, who are to meet annually at one of the principal towns to discuss agricultural subjects.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES. It will have been perceived by those who have read Mr. Stevens' most attractive volumes of travels in Central America—and we pity those who have not—that the latter information from a "Padre" or Roman Catholic clergyman, which leads him to feel pretty certain that there is at this time existing, in Vera Paz, a city of 100,000 inhabitants, the ruins of a city of preservation much greater than the ruined places which he actually visited, and almost as perfect as when its inhabitants lived. He also obtained information from the same source of another city, now actually inhabited, south of Chiapas, which remains all its primitive outness, and is still in the occupancy of the Indians; who have never submitted to the white conquerors of the country, and which has never been controlled—scarcely known, indeed—by the Central American government. Here, then, is a field for exploration, and well may Mr. Stevens say that he who visits it, will "experience sensations which seldom fall to the lot of man."

Mr. Stevens is just the one to do it, and, we are very much deceived in the man if he does not undertake the journey before he is much older. The government ought to give him a commission that will enable him to travel with official facilities all over the country.

BANKS. In the state of Georgia there are, it is said, ninety banks, including the several branches. This is not quite one bank for each county, as there are about ninety-six counties in the state. The glorious effects of the multiplication of banks is exemplified in the present state of Georgia currency.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND. "Among other large things, is the Bank of England, which covers five acres of ground, and employs over nine hundred clerks. Every thing for the use of the bank is made on its own premises; and the printing of its notes is a large item. A note once returned to the bank is never re-issued, but is filed away, and at the end of every year the workmen are duly at work every day of the year, save Sunday, in printing notes. At the annual burning, two days are required, with a large fire, to destroy the old notes, and the employees two men constantly in feeding the fires."

VIC ADMIRAL CHARLES BAUDIN has been appointed marshall prefect at Toulon. Admiral Baudin, says the Times, "is the crack naval officer of France." The mission to which he has been appointed is necessary, as he should return in Toulon whether, in 20 minutes a telegraphic dispatch might convey so order that he proceed to see forthwith, and take the command of the French fleet in the Mediterranean.

FLORIDA. The late accounts from Tallahassee represent the congestive fever raging to that place and its vicinity as unabated. It is said to defy all remedies, and there is scarcely a family untraced. The pestilence is not confined to one region of country, but spreading through the whole of Florida. A correspondent of the New York Post says:

"The violence of the fever is such that no mortal power can stay its ravages, and six hours generally suffice to carry off its victims. The Asiatic cholera is raging, not only among the United States troops, but throughout the whole region of Florida. Never has the season of such general and dreadful disease been known in the south."

FORSYTH BAKES. The eminent banking house of Forsyth & Co., at Vienna, whose liabilities are reported to be very heavy, has stopped payment. This stopping following that of Messrs. Smith, occasioned a regular panic in the money market when it first became known, but by the judicious efforts of Messrs. Rothschild and other leading capitalists at Vienna, confidence was rapidly improving.

A GRAPE VINE. A correspondent of the Boston Post, writing from London, gives a lively description of one at Hampton Court, and its appendages. "Among the things noticed is a grape vine. He says, 'in a separate house is a grape vine, supposed to be the largest in the world; its thirty inches in circumference, the roots its longest branch is 110 feet, and it has borne 2,600 bunches of grapes.'"

HUNTON, TEXAS, which was settled five years ago has now four thousand inhabitants, and within the space of thirty miles there are 100,000 head of cattle. An average of nearly four every day in the year.

THE HUNDRED WEIGHT. It is not long ago since the Americans reduced the hundred weight from 112 to 100 pounds. The odd 12 bothered them in the calculations, and was observed not to be of the smallest use in any respect, so having resolved to cut down the hundred weight to what it ought to be, namely, one hundred pounds, they immediately, and without any fuss, executed their resolution. This is a small matter, but it is the characteristic of the country in which it took place. We question whether the British could manage to take the odd twelve pounds from the hundred weight, and about a twenty year's talk. It does not signify that nobody can explain how or when the odd twelve originated. "There it is—that is sufficient—it must not be meddled with, would you ruin the country with your pretended improvements." The hundred weight alone—we have become a great people with it as it is, and with that lot you be content."

INTENDED INSURANCE OF SLAVES. New Orleans, July 22. The overseer of the plantation of Robert J. Barrow, of west Feliciana, having occasion to raise from his bed live one of the recent hot nights, heard, he says, he negroes conversing in the quarters. On silently approaching the vicinity and listening, he overheard two of the slaves discussing the subject of a rising against the whites. This led to the examination the next morning of the two fellows when they confessed the fact, and gave information that led to the arrest of several others. The alarm was immediately spread abroad, arrests were made in various quarters, and it was found by the confession that they all agreed in the main facts, that there was to be a general rise and that the first of August was the day agreed upon.

A white man, a carpenter, who had lately done a job of work for Mr. Barrow, was arrested on suspicion, and examined. He said he had nothing to do with the matter, and he negated every thing the negroes on the subject, but acknowledged that they frequently spoke to him, and informed him all about it.

Three white men with about forty negroes, all of whom had confessed their own part in the intended rise, were in the jail at St. Francisville, guarded by a company of volunteers. Their examination by a French official, was to have commenced yesterday at 10 A. M.

At Woodville, we learn, numerous slaves were confined in the jail, having confessed to the same facts as those named at Feliciana.

LONGEVITY. We learn by the recent census, that there are 250 individuals in the state of North Carolina over 100 years of age making an average of nearly four to each county.

Gov. MOREHEAD. The speech of governor Morehead in the senate on the bank bill, is thus spoken of by the Madisonian: "Fervent to the vote on the amendment, the senate was addressed by Mr. Morehead, at considerable length, and however we may differ about the constitutionality of the bill, none can deny that Mr. Morehead presented the arguments and authorities in its favor in the strongest point of view. Mr. Morehead is the successor of Mr. Crittenden in the senate, and as a debater he has almost always been considered as the former place of orators. There is Clay, and Crittenden, and Morehead, and Marshall, and others, forming a galaxy such as has seldom been seen from one state since the planting days of old Virginia. As Mr. Tallmadge justly said, the other day, in allusion to Mr. Morehead and his predecessor,

"Like the waves of a summer, as one dies away, Another is pleasing and shining comes."

"Mr. Morehead, stands among the 'tallons' of the Kentucky orators in every point of view. His speech, which was listened to with undivided attention, by the whole senate, and a very crowded audience, was marked by a nervous eloquence by an occasional word of satire, and by frequent passages of rhetorical beauty."

MILITARY COMMISSION. A field officer who sold out of the service, got $12,000 for the command of his regiment.

(London paper.)

McLEOD. The Montreal Courier, noticing the late decision of the New York supreme court, says—"Great Britain is not in honor put up with such a man, and will not allow Mr. McLeod to be tried for an act which his government has assumed as its own. The time must come when there can be no longer any dodging about the matter; and if our neighbors will persist in their assumptions, let them take the consequences, for however much we should deprecate a war with them under different circumstances, the sooner we decide this question the better. England could not have a better cause; and in Canada we have never been so well prepared for a trial of strength as at present—August we say, if we must come, let it come at once, for it is very evident unless we settle all our disputes now, it will only be putting off the evil day to a period when we may not be so disposed to deal with our willful and head strong neighbors."

NEEDLES. It is stated that in the small town of Redditch, in the county of Worcester, England, there are upwards of 70,000,000 of needles manufactured every year.

NEW YORK STATE LOANS. The New York Journal of Commerce says that, of the state loan of $3,000,000, 6 per cent. stock, for which bonds were opened on Monday last in that city, less than one hundred thousand dollars have been taken.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. The Liverpool Albion of the 19th ult. says: "Sir Robert Peel, not to speak it profanely, appears to be to the tones what satan was to the ancient Hebrews—a messenger from goodness sent to inflict evil. The respect his mission, but apprehend a thousand bad consequences from his propensities; like the doomed, who are represented from ghosts or fauns, as sensible in appearance, and actually proceeding to the commission of the most atrocious crimes, whilst they mysteriously discover their will to be the positive result of necessity. The evil genius who, every party is anxious to get a passage to America, who each expects to find friends. He shipped under the name of 'Billy Stewart,' and says her name is Isabella Stewart." (Paid. U. S. Gaz.)

A WOULD BE SAILOR. The ship Algoonquin, capt. A. Turley, from Liverpool, arrived this morning, and among her passengers is a healthy stout female, 16 years of age, who shipped in Liverpool as a sailor boy, being under the name of John Smith, and, from top to toe, and actually performed the duty of a lad on board, going sail, &c. for several days, when some suspicion arose among the crew, which led to the discovery of her sex. Capt. T. immediately had her removed from the fore-cabin to the steerage, and her dress changed for female apparel. It appears she is a destitute girl who had taken the method to get a passage to America, which she expects to find friends. She shipped under the name of 'Billy Stewart,' and says her name is Isabella Stewart. (Paid. U. S. Gaz.)

ROCK BALT. A body of rock salt, like that found in Europe, has been discovered near Abington, Virginia, at a depth of 380 feet. This is the first that has ever been found in the United States.

STEAMBOATS. The steamer New York from New Haven on Monday, brought to New York 325 passengers, at 12 1/2 cents each.

STOCKS have declined, the price of U. S. bank shares fell 1/4 [at] in New York on Wednesday last, and declined 1/2 [at] in London. The price of the Canal shares of 1839 sold at 85; Indians bonds at 87.

SUIT AGAINST MR. BIDDLE. Yesterday a "non" (declarator) was filed in the case of the president, directors and company of the Bank of the U. States, versus Mr. Charles Biddle. The damages are laid at one million of dollars. For the plaintiff, Messrs. Rawle, Wharton and F. W. Hubbell. For the defendant, Messrs. Russell, Dallas and Meredith. [U. S. Gazette.]

MR. SWARTWORTH, late collector of the port of New York, arrived at Boston in the Acadia, and proceeded immediately to New York, which he reached on the 4th inst., and was immediately summoned before the custom house investigating committee now in session there.

TRAVELLING. The number of persons travelling on the Hudson river is said to be greater this season than at any time since 1836.

TREASURY NOTES. Treasury department, August 3, 1841. The following table shows the issue under previous laws of the acts of congress of 1837, 1838, 1839 and 1840.

WETWARD WOL. The Milwaukee Sentinel says—"There has been a time when settlers were flocking into Wisconsin in greater numbers than now. Every boat brings us large numbers of immigrants of the most respectable character, and the immigration by land is increasing. It is a source of regret that an enviable one, and the inducement for settlers greater than in any other portion of the west."

WHEAT is selling at Philadelphia at 127; in Baltimore at 130, 127 for red, and 140 for white.

BRITISH AMERICA. Among the despatches from the home government, recently laid before the legislature of Canada, is one from lord John Russell, expressing in the following emphatic language, "the determination of England to maintain her authority over her possessions on this continent. 'In any measure,'" lord John Russell says, "that may be adopted it must be taken for granted that her majesty persists in the determination to maintain all its lands her royal authority in Canada. Neither the honor of her aid nor the safety of her empire is due to her loyal subjects in British North America, nor the provident care of the empire at large, would permit any deviation from this fixed principle of British policy."

"At the same time her majesty's advisers are not insensible to the difficulties imposed upon them in carrying into execution the purposes of the crown. A province bordered by an open frontier of more than a thousand miles—approached with ease at all times by the citizens of a neighboring and powerful state, separated from England not only by the ocean, but by the rigors of climate and season, must be maintained by a judicious preparation for defence in time of peace, and a rigorous exertion of the resources of the empire in time of war, or not at all. To trifle with the fortunes of men whose lives and properties are freely devoted to the service of England, or to encourage foreign aggression by a passive acquiescence, would be far more than the spontaneous surrender of these important possessions of the crown. The Canadians might, in such a case, incur no risk; no blood need be shed; and the treasures of the empire might be spared. The other course would be cruel to a brave people, and unbecoming the character of the country."

"But as I have already said we have no alternative, we have only to consider the means of binding Canada more firmly in this country, of developing her resources, of strengthening her British population, of defending her territory, and of supporting and encouraging the loyal spirit of her people."

ENGLISH IN CHINA.

The foreign news by the Columbia, published in Saturday's American, was calculated to arrest attention by the unexpected suddenness of its arrival, as well as by reason of its great importance. The British are in possession of Canton! How strangely it sounds—how incredibly would such an event have appeared if it had been predicted five years ago!

With every successive collision between the Chinese and their invaders, the imbecility of the former appears more and more manifest. The conquest of Mexico and Peru by the Spaniards under Cortes and Pizarro, affords the only parallel to the warfare now urged in the celestial empire. How far the supremacy of Great Britain may be established over that country seems to depend entirely on the extent of the views of policy that may direct her movements. If Canton could be taken without the loss of a single man, there is not much reason to apprehend effectual resistance to any enterprise which the invading forces may see proper to undertake.

When lord Clive carried the British standard from victory to victory in Hindostan, at the first conquest of that region, the spirit of plunder, once quickened by the sight of vast treasures lying at the feet of the conquerors, gave a powerful impulse to the progress of the invaders. If this same spirit should be aroused by the sack of Canton, who can venture to guess where its ravages will be stopped in an empire where the accumulated wealth of centuries is deposited? The amount of precious metals in China—particularly silver—must be immense. For the system of commerce long since established there has tended to bring coin into the country and to prevent its exportation.

Vol. X.—No. 24.

It is an idea which strongly moves the imagination—that which presents to us the spectacle of an army of foreigners in the midst of a Chinese city, whose walls for ages and centuries have been jealously closed against the entrance of a stranger. The curiosity of the civilized world is aroused to know what sights—what objects—will be there presented to the gaze of armed intruders.

Nor is there less of interest in considering that this successful invasion of a great empire has been effected by a nation inhabiting a remote little island in the western extremity of Europe—a spot insignificant in itself, yet rendered by the power of intellect one of the chief focal points of this world's doings.—What are the inherent greatness of the race which, from a mere foothold as a starting place, has diffused its spirit and extended its power to the extremity of the earth—conquering the wilderness of nature in one hemisphere, and overthrowing empires in the other? Such results, if they teach nothing else, will at least show that in the mind of man dwelt the true elements of human power—that ideas and principles are real things, whereunto the outward paraphernalia of state and circumstance are subservient mere instruments, having no efficacy in themselves.

MINISTER TO BRAZIL. Letters from Washington intimate that it is the intention of the government to send a full minister to Brazil, in place of Mr. Hunter, our charge d'affaires. It is stated as a reason for the appointment of a minister, that the present is a peculiarly appropriate time for extending our relations with Brazil, as our treaty with her expires in 1842.

The treaty between Brazil and England expires in 1844, and the former government is not disposed to renew it, for very good reasons too; for while the treaty admits English manufactures into Brazil at a duty of fifteen per cent, it makes no provision for the admission of Brazilian productions into England, other than the duty shall be no higher than on similar productions from other countries. Under this treaty British manufactures to the value of about $25,000,000, are annually imported into Brazil, while the chief staples of Brazil, except cotton, are virtually prohibited in England. There is a strong disposition in Brazil to encourage their own manufactures, by discriminating and retaliatory duties on England, and to submit it to other and more equal terms in the renewal of the treaty.

[Newburyport Mercury.]

[We see that the secretary of state asks for an appropriation for a full minister to Brazil.]

THE FISCAL BANK BILL, which we announced the passage of in the last Register, was placed in the hands of the president on Friday the 6th inst.—since which the most intense anxiety has been evinced to ascertain whether it would be signed or vetoed. Up to the hour at which this number goes to press, nothing has been ascertained.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES. It is admitted by politicians on all sides that one of the first duties of a good government is to provide for the national defence. For this purpose public sentiment calls for an increase of our naval strength; for additional fortifications at important points; for the establishment of armories; for the construction of steam batteries, and so on. The recent passage of the marine squadron bill gave great and general satisfaction.

In case of a war with a foreign power—an event which is always to be looked forward to as possible—such preparations as we have spoken of will have their use. But there are other means of national defence no less useful; and with the further advantage of being highly promotive of public prosperity in time of peace. We may illustrate what we have referred to by the following remarks of the London Quarterly Review on the real objects of the British protective policy: "The safety of this country," says the Review, "depends on its navy; and a navy is not merely a collection of well fabricated machines, which may be erected at any time, and to any extent, by almost any nation; and willing to undertake the necessary expense. The real essential strength of a navy is that which never can be created pro re nata, by any expense or any efforts—and ample and constant supply of hardy and skilful sailors. But there are other means of comparatively short period out of any population, and out of the least instructed part of any population; but seamen can only be made by early practice and long experience of the sea; and these again can only be applied by maritime commerce. This was the policy and basis of our navigation laws; and this is the true, or at least the greatest value of our colonial possessions: this accidental and exceptional necessity which distinguishes the smaller empire of Britain from all other states, creates and improves on an exceptional line of policy—to which the situation of other countries affords no analogy, and the general theories of economists have no application."

The Review goes on to show the special application of its remarks by an example—thus: "If foreign ships could bring us sugar at 1d. a pound, while, if conveyed by the better and therefore more expensive system of English navigation, it cost 2d. the additional penny would not be a mere tax upon sugar, but part of the price paid for the education, the maintenance and increase of a superior class of native seamen—without whom in day of war, the world would be without the means of a long peace blockade sugar at 1d. a pound."

It is not a mere "accidental or exceptional necessity" which renders the policy of Great Britain in this particular proper and judicious. The same necessity applies to any commercial nation that must maintain an efficient navy. But this refers more especially to discriminating foreign duties on vessels.

The same course of reasoning, however, comes with equal force to support that system of protective duties which looks to the fostering of domestic interests, when those interests are necessary to the nation's defence in time of war. With this regard to iron and coal—both of which articles are essential to the construction and use of steamships, and to some of our other applications—there ought to be an entire self-dependence on native resources. Why should we look to Wales and Sweden for supplies of iron, or to Pileton for coal, when both may be had in the mountains of Pennsylvania and Virginia? It is not only that we pay annually large sums abroad for iron and iron manufactures which could be had at home—the worst of it is that we are withdrawing from our own domestic establishments that enterprise, which, if extended, would build them up securely, and enable them in time of emergency to strengthen the arm of the government with the most potent weapons of war. Skill and dexterity in all sorts of handicraft are the results of much practice; they are not to be had at a moment's warning. Nor are the means of large supplies, when unexpectedly wanted, to be furnished forthwith. There must be large investments previously; and these will be made only when the policy of the government is favorable and to be depended upon.

Protection, such as we refer to, is judicious only when there is a substantial basis for the interest protected. When national industry is in the hands of care and industry are invited by the very fact. The abundant resources of this country in the two most important elements of mineral wealth are well known. Surely it is not wise that these should be suffered to lie dormant in the bowels of the earth, when by the policy of government they might be brought forth, to give exercise to industry, to increase the store of national production, and to add strength to the arm of public defence.

[Bull. Amer.]

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. A report from the superintendent of standard weights and measures has been communicated to congress by the secretary of the treasury, announcing the completion of the final series, (the ounce weights). We perceive by it that it is deemed important that the governors of the several states be invited to send directions to the treasury department to whom and how the standards may be forwarded, in order to reach their aim of public utility. There might then also be forwarded, at the same time, the yards, and some of the sets of the large weights, which remain still in the vaults of the treasury department, uncalled for, to bring them into that actual use which, at the time of their beginning, seemed so much desired. Mr. Haasler states that with the present delivery, the task of the construction of standards of the weights for the states, as well as for the custom houses, is completely solved. The sets of ounce weight for the states, begin with the ten ounce weight, and go down, decimally subdivided, to the one-tenth thousandths of the ounce. A number of standard yards sufficient for all the states, and for some of the custom houses, were completed last year.

[Madisonian.]

FORTIFICATIONS. The fortification bill, as it passed the house, stands the following appropriations:

For the forts in Boston harbor	$184,000
New Bedford	8,000
Newport, R. I.	45,000
New London, Ct.	45,000
Fort Niagara	20,000
Fort Ontario, Oswego	15,000
Fort near New York	130,000
Fort Delaware	50,000
Fort at Annapolis, Md.	5,000
Fort Washington	35,000
Fort Monroe, Old Point	115,000
Fort Caswell and Johnson, &c.	8,000
Fort near Charleston, S. C. &c.	45,000
Fort Pulaski, Savannah	25,000
Fort Marion, &c. St. Augustine	25,000
Fort at Pensacola	65,000
Fort Morgan, Mobile	40,000
Fort Livingston, Barataria Bay	80,000
Fort near New Orleans	55,000
Contingencies for fortifications	15,000
Incidental expenses for the same	55,000

For fortifications	$1,019,000
For current expenses of ordnance service	$23,000
Purchase of ordnance and ordnance stores	75,000
Armament of fortifications 100,000
Purchase of saltpetre and brimstone	30,000
For preventing and repressing Indian hostilities under various heads	$220,000 00

Making a total appropriated by this bill, as it passed the house, of $2,022,657 66

It has since passed the senate, with some amendments, one of which appropriates $100,000 for armed steamers on Lake Erie; another $75,000 for an armory in the city of New York, for the manufacture of arms and defensive works at Detroit.

At present the British have two armed steamers on Lake Erie and we none.

INDIAN WAR. A battle recently took place near Council Bluffs, between the Pottawattamies and Sioux Indians, in which five Sioux, (the whole party), were killed, and three Pottawattamies killed and one wounded. The party of Pottawattamies was about 35 in number.

After this, a party of about 30 Pottawattamies went out to search of Sioux, and as nothing had been heard from them at Council Bluffs, it was thought that the Pottawattamies had been entirely cut off or captured.

THE BRITISH MOVEMENTS. The St. Johns Courier of July 31st, terms from Mr. Perley, who has just returned from Temiscouata, that while he was there, captain Nelson, of the royal engineers, arrived there express from Quebec, with instructions to put the various frontier posts, now held by detachments of the 56th regiment in an efficient state of defence without delay. Market-proof defenders around the barracks at Temiscouata were forthwith commenced, and captain Nelson then proceeded to the Degele and the Little Falls at the mouth of the Madawaska river, where a new and very strong block house is now in course of erection.

Captain Nelson remain at the Little Falls to superintend the completion of the block house, and despatched lieutenant Norton of the 66th, (an acting officer of engineers), and Mr. Tennant, of the commissariat, to the Grand Falls, for the purpose of removing all the guns and stores placed there to the block house, and also to bring up the artillerymen stationed there to the same place. Mr. Perley left the Grand Falls last Saturday, when the packing of the stores had commenced, and it was understood that the whole would move upwards on Wednesday last to flat boats which were getting ready. It was said (says the Courier) that these arrangements were made in consequence of an apprehension that some difficulty might arise between Mr. Fox and the American government, in consequence of the apparent determination to place Mr. McLeod upon his trial for murder, and it was therefore deemed prudent to put these posts in a state of defence, in order to prevent any possibility of interruption by land between this province and Canada being suddenly cut off.

The detachment of the 66th, at the Little Falls, is under the command of J. Smith; the post at the Degele, held by capt. Vaukey, and his company, and the post at Leconteville, is commanded by captain Charlewood.

Great Britain is thus going ahead very fast with its encroachments in Maine. Will the American government note its progress?

STATUE OF WASHINGTON. Greenough's statue of Washington has arrived at Washington from Italy. It is said that the doorway of the capital is not large enough to admit it to its destined position in the rotunda. A foreign journal speaks of the performer—"Truly may it be said, 'blessed are they who do not expect' for where I expected to be disappointed I was more than delighted. I had heard much, so much of Greenough's colossal statue of Washington, that I thought it utterly impossible that it could produce an effect upon me proportionate to the praises I had heard bestowed upon it, especially as I remembered the almost digit with which I had looked at Thrownwald's modern statue—the slenderly dressed statue of Lord Byron, and to say the least of it, Washington, particularly when magnified, was a more unpoetical, therefore a more difficult subject. But the manner in which Greenough has executed his almost impossible task is only another proof that genius can make a statue of the commonest and most commonplace things, just as a man was a mass of inanimate clay 'of the earth, earthy,' till God breathed immortality into him, and so formed him after his own image. Nothing can be more human, and at the same time more godlike, than his colossal statue of Washington. It is a sort of domestic jupiter—the sublime repose and simplicity of the whole figure, united, as it is, with ascending energy of expression, is perfectly classical, without the slightest abstract imitation, for the artist seems to have embodied Seneca's admirable advice in a style—semile ex vivo, quoniam finis, non quoniam imago, as there is no mistake the pure lineage of this statue—... fill the central point of the map of the United States, he has addressed his statue of Washington to a distant posterity, and made it rather a poetical abstract of his whole career, than the chronicle of any deed, or any leading feature of his life, which, as there is no other person, and extends with his left hand a sword, the emblem of his military command, towards the people; as the sovereign, he points heavenward with his right hand, by this double gesture is conveyed the idea of ascending, suggestive of self, and seeking the purest conductor in it was, between God and man.

The chair in which he is seated, being too large to be left out, tells also its history. The superior part is richly ornamented with acanthus, and garlands of flowers, while the base is solid, simple, massive, which plainly indicates that high cultivation is the proper result of sound government, and that nations, when piloted and well tilted, must flourish as well as grow. By the figure of the Columbian, which leans against the back of the chair on the left side, is connected the history of America with that of Europe, while that of the Indian chief on the right is emblematic of the state America was in when civilization first dawned upon her. The figure of the right side, seated in the chair, which was the first crew of American ships, is the rising sun under which is inscribed, Magnus ab initio sacculus nascitur ordo. The relief on the left side represents the geni of North and South America, under the forms of the infants Hercules and Iphigene, the latter shrinking in dread, whilst the former struggles successfully with the obstacles and dangers of an incipient political existence. The motto for this bas-relief is, Incipere posse et non desinere periculis. In this statue, Greenough has achieved a glorious work and one that cannot fail to reach its destination—namely, the distant posterity to which it is addressed.

THE ARMY.

Glorious news from Florida! Cococoe's whole band—close of the Florida war. By the U. S. steamer gen. Taylor, capt. Peck, arrived at Savannah, August 7, we have the gratifying intelligence from Florida, that the great Florida military expedition, may now be considered as at an end. Wild Cat's whole band, men, women, children and negroes, 160 in all have come in at Tampa, and 40 more Indians of another band were on their way, and were expected at Tampa in two days. A gentleman who was on the gen. Taylor, says that he does not think another rifle will be fired by the enemy.

When Cococoe's family came in, col. Worth told him that he might go on shore from the steamer where he has come, and he refused to do so, saying that though he was anxious to see his family, he would not permit them to see him in front. The colonel finally consented to let him go on shore without his shackles, and after a warm greeting, they parted. The fact he said, was the coldest, and then returned on board the steamer. As soon as his lions were replaced, he told col. Worth that he had but one request more to make, and that was, to allow him and his people to go west as soon as possible.

We understand that col. Worth on taking command in Florida, set the first day of January, 1842, as the time of closing this war. From his admirable management and indomitable perseverance, seconded by the gallant officers and troops now in the field, there is every prospect that he will redeem his pledge. Should he succeed, he will have the honor of accomplishing what older and more experienced commanders have failed to perform.

During the war many of the officers of our gallant little army have distinguished themselves, and some of them would have done so, had opportunities been presented. It had been a field in which there has been plenty of hard service and but little glory.

Every thing that could be done, and we are glad once more to see a prospect of speedily subduing the enemy.

The first regiment of infantry now in Florida has been ordered to leave for New Orleans, and the Chien; upon Mississippi. They are to leave immediately.

St. Augustine, August 2, 1841. The steamer Wm. Gaston, capt. Somers, arrived this afternoon from southern ports. The large scout started from Key Biscayne, under the command of the Ensign, on the evening of Friday, the 20th ult. consisting of six companies of artillery, under the command of captain Burke, and a number of sailors and marines under the command of captain Rogers and others.

We are sorry to learn that that gallant officer, Major Childs, who was to have commanded the expedition was left sick at Fort Dallas. The posts south, are generally very healthy, with the exception of the posts near Key West, owing to the exposure of the men to the sun.

Major Childs has issued an order for the removal of all the stores and stores, from Key Biscayne to Fort Dallas, and will break up that post (the Key) entirely.

The accounts from Key West are of the most deplorable nature. The yellow fever is said to be raging at that place, and very fatal; a large number have already fallen victims to it. One of the unfortunate victims is Mr. Leavenworth C. Harvey.

The fever has been still worse at Havana, and we learn that there are now American ships now lying in that port without a soul on board, all having died of the prevailing fever.

We have no further news from Tampa Bay to communicate, since the last intelligence of the Indians coming in very rapidly.

The season has been exceeding unhealthy in Middle Florida. A letter dated Tallahassee, 7 July is organized and put in motion, without occupying a single point of the disputed ground of the constitution.

Still, however, Mr. President, (said Mr. Rives) an objection has been somewhat started to this arrangement, that though the power of congress to create banking corporations within this District is unquestionable, yet they can be constitutionally exercised here only for local and not for national uses. On what principle is this objection as this is sustained? The District itself was created and set apart as an exclusive jurisdiction wholly for national considerations—to give entire freedom and independence to the deliberations and action of the national authorities established here. Mr. Rives said he had the sanction of the highest judicial authority known to our institutions for saying that the power of "exclusive legislation" over this District was conferred on congress not, as some times loosely said as a local legislature for the District, but emphatically as "the legislature of the union." What is this magnificent capital erected here for—for what the treasury building and all the other public edifices connected with the operations of the government, unless for national purposes? If Mr. Rives is right, the legitimate national object can any establishment be founded here than to be an auxiliary, and, in some sort, an adjunct to the great revenue department of the government?

It is true (said Mr. Rives) that acts done here, in virtue of the power of "exclusive legislation" over this District, are limited, in their intrinsic force, to the District. They have no operation, per se, beyond the District. Accordingly, the corporation proposed to be created here, as the fiscal agent of the government, will have its legal corporate existence here, and no where else. To use the language of the supreme court of the United States, in a recent case, "having an important bearing on the questions we are now discussing, it is 'to dwell here in the place of its creation.' But this does not prevent it, any more than corporations created by state authority, from extending its operations, by branches or agencies, into the states of the union, with THE ASSENT OF THOSE STATES. In every such case, the extra-territorial operation of the institution would be the result, not of any intrinsic force derived from the act of incorporation, but of the sovereign assent of the states permitting it to extend its operations within their limits. But this (said Mr. R.) is to anticipate a question which has not yet arisen, and to discuss much more at large. I return to the competency of congress to incorporate a bank in this District for national uses.

It will be seen, said Mr. Rives, if we trace the history of all the legislative discussions which have ever taken place on the constitutional power of congress to establish a national bank within the limits of the states, that the most determined opponents of the general power have invariably admitted the authority of congress to incorporate and establish such a bank within the District of Columbia. In 1791, when the first debate took place in congress on this disputed question, Mr. Fisher Ames, by way of illustrating and enforcing his argument in favor of the power, put the case of a bank established here under this power of exclusive legislation over the District, and said such a bank "could send its paper all over the union." Mr. Giles, of Virginia, and Mr. Stone, of Maryland, both distinguished opponents of the general power of congress to establish a national bank within the states, in noticing and replying to the argument of Mr. Ames, clearly admitted the authority of congress to establish such a bank as Mr. Ames had described, within the District. Again, in 1811, when, at the expiration of the charter of the first bank of the United States, the discussion was renewed on the constitutional power of congress, similar admissions as to the District were made, in unequivocal terms, by several of those who were most earnest in denying the general power of congress to create a national bank within the states.

But I have, said Mr. Rives, to come down to a more recent period of our political history, when recognitions of the same doctrine thicken upon us, and from quarters distinguished, or claiming to be distinguished, by peculiar republican orthodoxy. In 1814, when the effort to obtain a re-establishment of a national bank was first formally renewed, after the unsuccessful struggle of 1811, the subject came before congress on a petition of a number of the citizens of N. York. It was referred to the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives, at which Mr. Epes, a distinguished republican representative from Virginia, was the chairman. As chairman of the committee, Mr. Epes reported against the constitutionality of the proposed bank, and embodied the grounds of that report in the following resolution, which, as setting forth distinctly the principle on which the objections of the republicans party of that day, to the constitutional power of a national bank rested, deserves particular notice.

"Resolved, That the power to create corporations within the territorial limits of the states, without their consent, is the power only of the powers delegated by the constitution of the United States, and is essentially necessary for carrying into effect any delegated power."

It cannot fail to attract attention, that the terms of this resolution, by an obvious and necessary implication, denied the power to create such a corporation as proposed, within the District of Columbia.

But this conclusion was not left to interfere only. The distinguished senator from S. Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun), then a distinguished member of the house of representatives, moved a recommitment of the report to the committee which brought it in, with the avowed purpose of obtaining their report in favor of a national bank in the District of Columbia—a report which was accordingly afterwards presented by the honorable gentleman seems frequently to support us on this side of the house of a design to misrepresent him, I will give his own words, as taken from the records of the day:

"It is clearly then said it would be found that the committee of ways and means had decided against the proposition, on the ground of unconstitutionality of establishing such a bank as that asked for in the petition. He wished to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national bank within the District of Columbia; the power to do which, it could not be doubted, even within the constitutional powers of congress. For all practical purposes he believed such a bank would be as useful as that which was proposed. To state at his object, Mr. C. proposed the following motion:

"Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national bank, to be located in the District of Columbia."

This occurred during the first session of the 13th congress. At the succeeding session of the same congress the subject was resumed. Mr. Dallas, in the meantime, had become secretary of the treasury, and in October, 1816, he presented to congress a fifty million national bank, to be established at Philadelphia. That plan being under consideration in the house of representatives, and a resolution having been offered, declaring it to be expedient "to establish a national bank, with branches, in the several states," Gov. Wright, of Maryland, then a leading republican member of that body, moved to amend the resolution by inserting therein the words "within the District of Columbia." What said Wm. A. Burwell, of Virginia, on that occasion? "He and what he was, no one knows better than the honorable senator from South Carolina. I will only say that, through the whole of his patriotic and distinguished life, he was a strict constructionist of the 'most strictest sect,' and an inviolable and uncompromising defender of the general power of congress to establish a national bank. And yet, on the occasion here referred to, he did not hesitate to say that 'he had no doubt of the power of congress to establish a bank of the kind proposed,' (even a fifty million national bank, within the District of Columbia.)"

Having seen, said Mr. Rives, what were the doctrines of the old republican school on this subject, let us, for a moment, inquire if the modern democratic party have not, through its acknowledged interpretation of the constitution, held precisely the same doctrine. General Jackson, the grand lumina of the anti-bank party, was even sedulous in the most unqualified terms, the constitutional power of congress to establish banks in the District of Columbia, to any extent, and for any purpose. It is curious and remarkable coincidence that, the very act by which he put the veto on the bill for rechartering the late bank of the United States, he took special pains to re-affirm and vindicate the unlimited authority of congress to create banks in this District. In that bill was a provision that no other bank should be established by congress during the continuance of the institution thereby rechartered, except "that congress might renew existing charters for banks within the District of Columbia, not increasing the capital thereof, and might also establish any other bank or banks in this District, with capitals not exceeding in the whole six millions of dollars." This restriction general Jackson seized upon, and signalled in his veto message as particularly unconstitutional. It is so sought to be made the ground of the constitutional power of congress to establish banks in the District of Columbia, and increase their capital at will—a power which he pronounced to be "unlimited and uncontrollable by any other authority than that which gave existence to the constitution!"

Mr. Van Buren, his anointed successor, as head of the modern democratic party, in like manner, unequivocally admitted the constitutional power of congress to establish a national bank (ex nomine) within this District. There is his famous letter to Mr. Sharrod Williams. Let gentlemen read it, and make any thing else out of it, if they can. In expressing his opinions on the subject of the constitutional power of congress to establish a national bank, his negation of the power is invariably made in reference to the states. Adopting the language of his friend, Mr. Butler, he says "he holds that congress has no power to create a national bank in any of the states of the union." "He is, therefore, decidedly opposed to the establishment of a national bank in any of the states;" and then adds, "he is also opposed to the establishment of such a bank in this District of Columbia as unconstitutional,"—implying that, in the District, it would be constitutional at least. No one can fail to perceive the marked contradiction throughout in his position as to the establishment of a national bank in the states and in the District, placing in opposition to the former on the ground of a want of constitutional power, and to the latter on considerations of expediency alone. Indeed, the very principle of the constitutional objection, as stated by him, and which he justly says was the main ground of the objection, is directly opposed against the establishment of the first national bank, to wit: "that the constitution does not give congress the power to erect corporations within the states," of necessity excludes the District of Columbia; for all must admit that the powers of congress possess the power of incorporation in this District.

The constitutional power of congress, then, to incorporate a bank in the District, for the convenience and uses of the government, if deemed expedient, is a power which has been recognized and admitted by all parties from the birth of the constitution down to the present day. It has been used in an especial manner, admitted, and in terms the most unequivocal, by leading and distinguished men of the republican and democratic parties, who have been most signalized for the zeal and earnestness, as well as ability, with which they have defended the general power of congress to establish a national bank within the limits of the states. After this steady and unbroken current of testimony and opinion flowing through the course of half a century, it would seem to be in vain to expect any other result, if the question is sustained. The plan of the secretary of the treasury, then, so far as the question of constitutional power is involved in the incorporation of a fiscal bank of the United States in this District, may be safely assumed to rest on a firm and certain basis.

Mr. Rives then proceeded to consider the other part of the secretary's plan, which provided for the assent of the states to the establishment of branches of the proposed fiscal bank within their respective limits; a principle which was rejected by the bill of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY), but which Mr. R. wished to restore by the amendment he had just offered. It is intended, in the report made by the honorable senator, (said Mr. R.) that this part of the secretary's plan is founded on the false principle that the powers of congress can be enlarged by the consent of individual states, without resorting to that process of amendment, requiring the concurrence of three-fourths of all the states, which the constitution itself provides. But he is entirely to be understood as not extending the assent he has attributed to the assent of the states by the secretary's plan. I fully and unhesitatingly subscribe (said Mr. R.) to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Madison,

"To the list of republican authorities may be added the following pregnant letter of that sterling republican and patriot, Judge Wise, of Tennessee:

"To the list of republican authorities may be added the following pregnant letter of that sterling republican and patriot, Judge Wise, of Tennessee:

DEAR SIR: Your favor, dated 15th ultimo, was received by the mail which arrived here on yesterday, and with pleasure I send you an immediate answer.

Your recollection of different conversations I owe to Mr. Kinsman is correct. I then stated, and yet believe, congress has not the power to charter a bank conferring upon it the power to do business within the limits of any of the states, and that the national bank, as created by the bill, would be found indispensable. I have heretofore said, and yet believe, congress has the power to charter one, to do business in the District of Columbia, and that they could authorize such bank to conduct its business in the states, in each state, with the consent of the respective states; and that through such a District bank, thus connected with the state banks, every desirable object towards keeping the currency in circulation, and thereby promoting the public mores, could be as certainly attained as through a national bank, and I am, I believe, as certain as I am of the truth of my own statements, that your object is attained."

D. A. CRAWFORD, esq.

*Bank of Augusta vs. Erie—Peterson's Report, vol. am. p. 249.

his veto message on the internal improvement bill, that the general powers of congress cannot be enlarged beyond the limits prescribed in the constitution, by the assent of individual states. But, in this case, no effect of that sort is claimed for the assent of the states. The assent of the states to the establishment, within their respective limits, of branches of the proposed fiscal bank, stated here, does not, in any manner whatever, enlarge the power of congress. The power of congress is fully exerted in the act of creating the corporation here, and giving it the legal attributes and facilities of an artificial being. The congress has not conferred any power to do this, has been already shown. The only effect of the proposed assent of the states is to permit this corporation, when thus lawfully and constitutionally created by congress here, to extend its operations, by such branches or agencies as it may think fit to constitute, within the limits of their respective sovereignties.

And will any gentleman seriously contend that it is not competent for the states to do this? Suppose that the state of New York should create a bank intended to promote her commercial intercourse with the other states of the union, by dealing in domestic exchanges—take, indeed, the existing case of the Pennsylvania bank of the United States—will any gentleman gravely contend that it would not be competent for Virginia, in the exercise of her own sovereignty to permit any such institution to establish a branch or agency within her borders? And could it be pretended in such a case, that the permission given by Virginia had, in any manner, enlarged the legislative power of the United States? Virginia, exerted in creating a corporation by the force of their own laws. If this can be legitimately done with regard to a bank created by the authority of a foreign country, for so the case of the Bank of England is, (said Mr. R.) that, with the sovereign assent of a state, even a branch of the Bank of England might be established within its borders, can it not be as unquestionably done with regard to a bank created by congress in this District? I do not deny it, it is not to question a power of congress, but to assail the vital principles of state sovereignty itself.

If the individual action of the states is such an anomaly as gentleman would represent it—never to be required in any case whatever in the operations of the general government—then, I presume, said Mr. President, that particular states have from time to time surrendered their soil and jurisdiction, ceded large portions of their territory, with all the rights of citizenship and sovereignty, to be added to the general government? I do not speak of the purchases of parcels of land made by the United States, with the consent of the legislatures of the particular states in which they lie, for the erection of forts, arsenals, dock yards, &c. because they are provided for by a special clause in the constitution. Nor do I speak of those earlier cessions of territory in the northwest made by the proprietor states previous to the adoption of this constitution; but I speak of those cessions and compacts of particular states, embracing large domains, made long since the adoption of the constitution. I speak of the cession of the western territory to the United States by Georgia in 1802, out of which two of the youthful states of the southwest, Alabama and Mississippi, have grown up; I speak of the surrender to the United States of her western reserve by the state of Connecticut at a still later period. Were these "nomination in the bond?" Can any gentleman show me any clause in the constitution which empowered these two states to make those large cessions to the United States? None! No, sir; there is none such. They acted each one for itself and from itself, in virtue of their separate sovereignty, existing anterior to the constitution, and still remaining, except where it has been restrained or taken away by positive provisions of the constitution.

This principle of state assent, in concurrence with acts of national authority, ought to be no novelty to the honorable member from Kentucky, at least. His annual journey from Ashland to Washington, and from Washington to Ashland is paved with it over every foot of the Cumberland road; for the honorable senator will doubtless recollect that, in the act which bears the signature of Mr. J. Caldwell, president of the United States—the previous assent of the three states of Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia was expressly required to be given in the construction of the road within their respective limits, and that assent was actually given by the legislative or formal acts of the legislatures of those states, before a spade or pickaxe was displayed upon their soil.

But there is a more recent act of a character less questionable, involving the same principle, and in which many of us personally bore a part, in which I beg leave to recall to the recollection of the Senate. I refer to the law passed by congress in 1836 for dispossing the surplus revenue of the United States in the treasuries of the several states, with the assent of the legislatures of the states in the disposal by acts of their respective legislatures. No gentleman will contend that congress could have obviated the keeping of any portion of the national treasure upon the states, or any of them, without their sovereign assent, separately and freely given, each one for itself, and yet, with the assent thus given, the legality and constitutionality of the arrangement never has been, and never can be, questioned. The principle of it is obvious. Congress, on its part, assumes the power to provide, at its discretion, for the safe keeping of the public money. The states, on their part, possess the power to accept the custody and use of those funds, if tendered, as they may think fit. The concurrent action of these two authorities, each exerting itself in its own sphere, and without in any manner adding to the power of the other in its sphere, produces precisely that practical result which is contemplated in the present case from the assent of the states, to the establishment, within their limits, of branches of an institution created by congress within this District.

I might, (said Mr. Rives), pursue this subject much further; but I forbear. I will only mention, in passing, for the edification of those professed disciples of strict construction who are in the habit of learning the lessons of any of the names of Mr. Jefferson, an instance in which that great republican statesman attributed to the individual assent of the states an efficacy, in regard to the distribution of power between the states and the general government, far beyond any thing that could be accomplished by the simple assent of the treasury. Believing that a final and adequate remedy could not be found for the disorders of the currency while the states possessed the power of creating banking institutions, he proposed, in a letter addressed by him, in June, 1818, to Mr. Eppes, then chairman of the committee of ways and means in the house of representatives, that "the states should be applied to, to transfer the right of issuing circulating paper to congress exclusively, in perpetuity, if generated not during the war of our independence, but at a subsequent letter addressed by him to the same gentleman in November, 1818, in which he uses the following language:

"I still believe that no proper representation of the true nature of the proposition, and the legal features would lead to congress their power of establishing banks, saving the charter rights already granted. And this should be asked, not by way of amendment to the constitution because, until three-fourths shall concur, nothing could be done, but simply by them one by one, singly, as their consent might be obtained."

I will not undertake to decide, (said Mr. Rives), how far this suggestion of Mr. Jefferson could be constitutionally carried into execution. I presume his idea was that each state, being competent to impose a voluntary limitation on the exercise of its own sovereignty, might, by some act, in the nature of a compact with the general government, agree to refrain from authorizing the issue of bank paper, leaving the vacuum thus created in its circulation to be supplied by treasury bills, (his favorite form of a paper currency), to be issued by congress in the exercise of a power already possessed by it—I think the only proper arrangement is a simple declaration of a portion of their power by the states without a corresponding concession of any new power to congress. And for this he may have supposed that there was the warrant of some analogy in the great compact of the new states with the general government, by which they agreed to waive for a time an important branch of their sovereignty—their taxing power, in regard to lands held or sold by the United States within their limits. But whatever may have been the idea of Mr. Jefferson, whether well or ill founded, it gives a slightless distance beyond any principle involved in the assent of the states to the establishment of branches of the central fiscal bank within their limits.

While there is no violation or abandonment of principle in the proposed assent of the states, it could not fall to exert a happy influence in reconciling opinions, and harmonizing public sentiment. In reviewing the history of the pure opposition to a national bank, it will be seen that the most important objection to it has ever been founded upon the supposed violation of the rights and sovereignty of the states in the introduction of an institution of so much power and influence within their borders, without their assent. That idea was completely put forward by the resolutions of the legislature of Virginia, in 1811, against a renewal of the charter of the first bank of the United States. That noble and resolute commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which so gallantly stood by the side of Virginia, in that memorable struggle, proclaimed her principles in language worthy of her own character and of the cause. I see her two distinguished senators now near me, and they will pardon me if I read the instructions which they gave to her senators in 1811, in which, with such becoming gravity, dignity and clearness, she put forth the grounds of her objections to the renewal of the charter of the first bank of the United States, or the incorporation of any similar bank. I wish those honorable gentlemen to read those instructions as still subsisting, in spirit at least, and then I might felicitate myself with confidence on receiving their able support on the present occasion. With their permission, I would read the instructions:

"The legislature of Pennsylvania, ever desirous to secure an administration of the federal and state governments, conformably to the true spirit of their respective constitutions, feel it their duty to express their sentiments upon an important subject now before congress, to wit: the constitutionality or establishment of a bank: From a careful review of the powers vested in the general government, they have the most positive conviction that the authority to grant charters of incorporation, within the jurisdiction of any of the states, is not conferred by the constitution, and that if it were, it would be so recognized in that instrument, either expressly or by any warrantable implication:

"Resolved therefore, That the senators of this state, Sec. be instructed to use every exertion in their power to prevent the establishment of a Bank of the United States from being renewed, or any other bank from being chartered by congress, designed to have operation within the jurisdiction of any state, without first having obtained the consent of the legislature of that state."

The spirit of these instructions is faithfully embodied, said Mr. Rives, in the amendment I have had the honor to submit.

But it is argued by many friends on this side of the coast, that the power of establishing branches of the proposed bank within the states, independently of their consent must be asserted, because the constitutionality of a national bank is now a settled question. That the constitutionality of a national bank is a settled question, I do not deny; but, in my opinion, it is a proposition, which, in my judgment, cannot be satisfactorily maintained. A retrospect of our political history will show that there have been at least as many decisions of the people and their representatives on this subject, as there have been in favor of it. If the congress of 1791 decided for it, the congress of 1811 decided against it. If a bank was re-established in 1816, it was permitted to expire by its own limitation in 1836, with a hearty acquiescence of a large majority of the people, at the time, in its fate. Three or four years before that time, general Jackson had negatived a bill for a recharter of the bank expressly on the ground of the unconstitutionality of an institution organized as that was. This he did in the very crisis of a pending presidential election, in which the propriety of his course on the subject of the bank was necessarily put to issue; and yet he was re-elected by an overwhelming majority of the popular suffrages.—When Mr. Van Buren became a candidate to succeed him, he declared in the most unequivocal terms, his thorough conviction of the want of constitutional power in congress to establish a national bank in any of the states of the union, and in a very earnest and emphatic manner, he declared his intention to vote on that issue in the election. And yet, with declarations such as these, precluding the possibility of a national bank for the ensuing four years if he were elected, he was chosen president of the United States.

In the result of the late presidential election, the question of the constitutionality of a bank cannot with fairness be said to have been decided by the judgment of the nation. There were too many other important issues to be decided, and the result was too uncertain. The consciousness of the sub-treasury minister in opposition to the administration of Mr. Van Buren many persons who differed widely on the question of a national bank. The opinions of the distinguished and talented individual who was the candidate for the presidency had been decidedly opposed to the constitutionality of a national bank. In his votes in the house of representatives at a former period, and in a letter addressed to his constituents in 1822, which was extensively republished, he had stated and declared these opinions in a strong manner. In his letter to Mr. Sherrod Williams, in 1826, it is true he said he would not withhold his signature, if elected president, from a bill, with proper modifications and relations, chartering a national bank, provided such an institution after a fair and full examination of other expedients, should be shown to be necessary.

for the management of the public revenue; and provided, also, there should be decided and unequivocal manifestations of the opinion of the country in favor of it. The qualifications and provisos with which he so carefully surrounded his answer, evidently left him uncommitted to the question, and taken in connection with his former well-known opinion, produced in Virginia at least, a very general impression, among those who supported his election, that the best of his own mind was strongly against a national bank. At the same time, the opinions on this question of the leading statesmen of the Union, as vividly presented for the second office to the government, and who has since been called to its head, were well known, and must of necessity have entered into the consideration of the nation; as the casting vote in the body, which he was to be invested as vice president, as well as the contingency, (by no means an improbable one, under the circumstances of the case), which has since devolved on him the office of chief magistrate, gave to these opinions the highest practical importance. His unvarying opposition to a national bank, on the ground of its unconstitutionality, had been vouched by the public history and records of the government, in the eyes of the nation, for near a quarter of a century.

[Mr. CLAY here rose and called Mr. RYAN to order, affirming that he was not alluding to the opinions of the president on a pending subject of deliberation.]

Mr. RYAN said the senator from Kentucky had certainly mistaken his purpose. He was making an historical review of the career of the president, the late presidential election, in reference to an issue alleged to have been made and decided in that election. It was in that connection only that he referred to the past opinions of the president on this question of a national bank as a question of his conduct; and in that connection it was surely both his right and his duty, if he thought proper to do so, to speak of them. He did not speak of what might or might not be the present opinions of the president, and least of all did he make any reference to his opinions with a view of producing any effect on the independent action and free deliberations of this body.

[Some further conversation ensued on the question of order, when the president was finally decided that the remarks of Mr. RYAN were in order.]

Mr. RYAN proceeded. I think, therefore, Mr. President, there is no sufficient ground for saying that the question of the constitutional power of congress to establish a national bank was decided in the late presidential election. I have seen with regret the persevering efforts that are now being made to liberate private judgment, by hiding up this question as one finally closed and settled by the most authoritative sanctions. Great names are arrayed, and I have seen this mighty name of Mr. Jefferson, who was at his life's end, crying out, in compromising support of a national bank, forward to sustain it. A statement is produced, from what source I know not, nor is it my purpose to question in any manner the respectability of it, that Mr. Jefferson, in a conversation with Mr. W. A. Burwell, of Virginia, in the spring of 1815, after the refusal of congress to recharter the first bank of the United States, declared that he considered the question of its constitutionality as having been definitively settled. Now, sir, the published writing of Mr. Jefferson shows that three years after that time he did, indeed, consider the question of the constitutionality of a bank of the United States as settled, but as settled against its constitutionality. In a letter to Mr. Eppes, the same writer, Mr. Jefferson, he used this emphatic language: "After the solemn decision of congress against the renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States, and the grounds of that decision, (the want of constitutional power), I had imagined that question at rest, and that no more applications would be made to them for the incorporation of banks."

The truth is, Mr. President, that this mooted question has received different decisions at the hands of the people and their representatives, at different times; and it is now as much a matter of difference of opinion at this as at any former period of our history. It has been settled one way at one time, it has been settled another way at another time; the result of which is, that it is yet an unsettled and open question, and will probably ever remain so, in the public judgment. I will not undertake to say on which side of it a majority of the nation are at this moment. All must admit that a very large and patriotic portion of the nation, (probably a majority of the nation), maintain the negative. In this divided and nicely balanced state of public opinion on a fundamental question of power, and one, too, which has never failed to excite a profound veneration through the mass of the people, is it not the part of true policy and wisdom to avoid this disputed question, when the same practical results can be attained in the most proper way by the secretary of the treasury? I would appeal to honorable gentlemen on this side of the house, and ask if they are not willing to show as much consideration for the honest and conscientious convictions of a large body of their fellow citizens, in regard to the sacred boundaries of the constitution, as they have shown in the case of the northeastern boundary, to the shallow and unfounded claims of a foreign power, in regard to the limits of the national domain, by establishing the dispute in its very origin.

Mr. RYAN said that in every country as a nation, in the history of that great struggle which had dissolved the British empire, we had a monetary lesson on the danger of extreme assertions of power, which ought not to be forgotten. That glorious and ever-memorable contest had arisen on the subject of the British parliament to tax the colonies without their consent. So long as the colonies were permitted to tax themselves, in the joyous pride and voluntary generosity of freemen they poured out their treasure, with untainted abundance, into the lap of the mother country. But, in an evil hour, the scheme was conceived of taxing them without their consent. The "dignity of the crown and the honor of parliament," it was said, required the assertion of power. The stamp act was passed and repealed. Peterbush, a colony now called New Brunswick, was sold; but the colonies, planting themselves on the imperishable principle of British liberty—the free consent of the people, through their representatives, to the imposition of taxes—reinstated, and again money was poured down the throat of the mother imposed by parliament, all were repealed except the miserable duty of three pence a pound on tea; and that was continued, not for revenue, for it yielded none, but as an assertion of the legislative supremacy of parliament over the colonies.

"It was by such management as this," in the magnificent language of Burke, "by the irresistible operations of ferocious councils, that so paltry a sum threw pence in the eyes of a financier, so insignificant an object in the eyes of a philosopher, shook and finally dissolved the pillars of a commercial empire that circled the whole globe."

Shall we follow so ill-fated an example, and insist on the power of establishing branches of the proposed fiscal bank within the limits of the states, without the assent of a majority of the legislative assembly of congress, when there is no reason to believe that every practicable object can be obtained without such assertion? Will gentlemen permit me to commend to them the example and the language of the great man whose name I have just mentioned, to the similar confessions in which he was placed? I like themselves, in regard to the power of congress to establish branches for the proposed bank in the states without their consent, he held, in the most unqualified manner, the abstract right of the British parliament to tax the colonies. As a member of the Rockingham administration, he was concerned fully in the declaration act which affirmed that right. But when it came to the question of carrying out the power in practice, against the remonstrances of the colonies, he opposed it with all the mighty weight of his eloquence and wisdom. He said he considered that day to have nothing to do with the right of taxation—it was less than nothing in his consideration—be looked to the policy of the question—to practical results. On the question of the right of taxation, (as to the question of the right of the British parliament to power of congress to create a national bank), he found opinions divided and perplexed—great names militated against each other in that field—high and revered authorities lift up their heads on both sides, and there was no sure footing on that ground. It was so.

"The great Serboian bug, Where armies walk have sunk."

"The question, therefore," said he, "is not what a lawyer shall tell me I may do, but what wisdom, prudence, reason, tell me I ought to do. What avails the strength of my legal title, if by its exercise I lose my suit? These, indeed, were words of sobriety and truth. I trust they may be better headed now than they were then. I commend them to the reflection of patriots and statesmen."

Mr. RYAN said there was another profound and important truth in capital letters, which the genius of American institutions—taught by the wisdom of the same great philosopher and statesman, which, he trusted, honorable senators would pardon him for recalling to their recollection. It was this, that "the consent of every wise public council ought to be to find out by cautious experiments, by cool and rational endeavors, with how little, not how much" power, governments could be conducted, and the affairs of nations be administered. Why, therefore, assert the disputed power of congress in this instance, admitting it to exist, till experience shall have shown it to be necessary for the successful operation of the great and honorable policy of the senator from Kentucky, I well recollect, said Mr. R., with that impressive and stirring eloquence which so eminently distinguishes him above other men, used to approach his political opponents, during the administration of the great and good senator, the assertion of power—ever intense, as he said, on the exercise of power, power, inexorable power. I trust, sir, we shall not fall into the same error now. The distinguished senator from Kentucky also had the honor to deliver the address of the hour, on the life of that true-hearted republican patriot, (Gen. Clinton), who then filled the chair you now occupy, Mr. President, the memorable words with which he began his casting vote against the bill for re-chartering the charter of the United States in 1811. The nation caught them as they fell, and has cherished them since as the oracles of wisdom. "In the course of a long life," said he, "I have found that government is not to be strengthened by the assumption of doing more than is just, but by the energetic execution of those which are incumbent on the former never fails to produce suspicion and distrust, whilst the latter inspires respect and confidence."

A firm conviction, said Mr. RYAN, is, that if the institution now proposed to be created shall be founded on the "incontestable" ground suggested by the secretary of the treasury, sustained and fostered by the assent and good will of the states, it will be far more efficient to every useful end, than if it be borne on the shifting sands of the United States government, thrusting it upon the states without their consent, and in despite of their objections. A proceeding of this sort necessarily begets opposition. A party war will be commenced upon it at the threshold of its own existence, and the use of agitation and contest. On the contrary, if you refer the establishment of branches to the assent of the states within whose limits they are to be placed, they will not merely be admitted, but they will be invited wherever the public interest shall place them. You disarm at once the jealously of state sovereignty. You place your institution under the safeguard of state honor, and under that moral protection of public sentiment which is far more powerful than the arm of the law. If any of the states should withhold their assent from the establishment of offices of discount and deposits, where they may be deemed necessary for the purposes of the institution, the assentual I have offered contains the ample provision for the establishment of limited agencies, which would meet the exigencies of the public service and the leading commercial wants of the union, and which, under a recent decision of the supreme court of the United States, (in the case of the bank of Augusta, v. Sack), might be established in the state without a formal act of consent on their part, their assent being presumed (till the contrary is declared) from the general course of nations.

With these provisions, adapted to every probable contingency, I feel persuaded, said Mr. RYAN, that the proposed institution would work well—smoothly, harmoniously, efficiently. I am far from placing any poor opinions of mine in competition with the sagacity and experience of the senator from Kentucky but, like himself, I have conferred with some able practical men, and they give me assurance of its feasibility and success. The secretary of the treasury, too, whose special province it is to collect information on these subjects from the most experienced sources, has, in his official presentation of the plan contemplated by the amendment, given us every reasonable warrant in advance of its capacity to meet the wants of the government and the country.

Mr. RYAN said the history of the two former banks of the United States ought to be full of instruction to us, and suggest some important reflections for our guidance on the present occasion. I do not now mean to inquire into the true measure of the benefits derived from them. But, admitting that, on this respect, I should be found to differ from some of my honorable friends on this side of the house, especially as to the last bank of the United States, which I believe was the author of all such evil as good could suffer. But, admitting that, as a source of public aid and indignation, sinking millions of the national capital in the convulsive struggles of their dissolution, and obliterating for a time every sense of its benefits they may have rendered to the country in the deep feeling of political hostility of Which they were the object. To avoid the recurrence of similar mischiefs hereafter, the institution now proposed to be created must be founded on different principles. You must especially avoid the original sin in the charters of the two former banks, by planting this on constitutional ground not liable to plausible objection, and by abstaining, in its organization, from any violation of the sovereignty of the states, or gratuitous offence to state pride. You must change its character. Instead of a commercial, trading, speculating, stock-jobbing bank, you must make it what its name imports—a fiscal bank—charged primarily with the collection, transmission and disbursement of the public revenue, but exerting incidentally an important and salutary influence on the general currency of the country. In short, sir, I would have it as unlike as possible the late bank of the United States. I would propose of the sober suggestions of such financiers as Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Appleton, who, in their late publications on the subject of the currency, have laid the country under obligations to their wisdom and patriotism.

I acknowledge, sir, with pleasure, the many valuable improvements and new securities engrained upon this bill now before us by the secretary of the treasury and by the honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY). With that distinguished senator I am heartily concurring in the propriety of the bill of the suggested application of the fourth instalment of the surplus revenue of 1836 to a subscription for stock in the bank on behalf of the states. With him, too, I cordially concur in the propriety of excluding, from the bank, all the possibilities of any transactions of a business character between the bank here and members of congress or officers of the government. A similar exclusion of the officers of the bank, the provisions for a large publicity in regard to the condition, operations and accounts of the bank; this narrower limitation than usual imposed on the amount of loans and discounts; and last, though not least, the non-renewability of notes and other evidences of debt discountable, (though it should be preferred for a much shorter term than one hundred and eighty days for them to run)—all these are great merits in the original plan of the secretary or the amendments of the senator from Kentucky. But yet one thing remains to be carefully guarded against in my humble judgment, than all the rest, to consolidate the public confidence and support, and to secure to this new institution a career of extended, useful and harmonious operation. Assert no odious or questionable right in its creation. Do not place it, at its very birth, a principle of contestation and strife. Let it have the free and conscientious support of all the elements of our mixed institutions—of state and of federal power harmoniously blended. Thus, and thus only, will it become what all must wish to see it, a national, and not a party institution, shielded by public opinion from those fierce political storms which marred the usefulness and finally overwhelmed in violent convulsions both of its predecessors.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, addressed the senate as follows:

I regret extremely that the senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) has felt himself constrained, by a sense of duty, to submit this amendment. No good, nothing, I fear, but unmix mischief, can come out of it, although I am quite sure this is far from the intention of the senator. The people want at our hands a bank, a real, old-fashioned bank—such an one as they and their fathers have long and justly experienced the benefits of. Now the institution, the proper organization of which we are considering, is to be a national bank or a local bank. If it is to be a national bank, we have the power to make it, or we have not. If we have the power, the states have already consented in the constitution, to the establishment of a national bank, no further or other consent from them is necessary. Indeed, if they have not already given their assent in the constitution, they cannot give it in any mode other than that which the instrument itself provides for, according to which there must be the concurrence of three-fourths of the states. This, I think, is too clear for argument. If we have no power to make an undesignated national bank, we ought not to attempt it. We ought not to seek to accomplish indirectly what we are not authorized or forbidden to do directly. This District of ten miles square was placed under the jurisdiction of the general government so that the federal authorities might govern it, not that, by means of the local jurisdiction, the whole union should be governed or controlled. We ought not to apply a power granted for one purpose to the attainment of another purpose, for which it is not given. I do not think, then, that we can establish a local bank, and impair the national faculties or functions. But the bank which the senator from Virginia proposes is, manifestly, a mere local bank of the District of Columbia. The senator might have spared himself some time in proving the power of congress to establish such a bank. There can be no doubt of the existence of such a power. It has been again and again exercised, in the chartering of the Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Patroble and other banks. Any one of these banks might have asked the permission of a state to establish a branch within its borders. The bank under consideration, if amended as proposed, would not essentially differ from them, except in the magnitude of its capital and the interest which that government takes in it.

Assuming the existence of the power as a settled and legitimate power, it ought to be exercised for the benefit of the whole union; and it ought to be so exercised, without soliciting any further consent from the states. If it be a federal power, it should be granted in the constitution, upon what possible ground of principle can we place our justification for not exercising the power, without the previous consent of the states, to be expressed hereafter in separate acts?—And if we established one rule in prior to the exercise of the constitutional power to establish a bank, we must obtain the consent of the states, what are the limitations, if any, to the rule? Must we not ask the previous consent of the states to exercise the power, to exercise the power to exercise in the constitution to the federal government?—If we propose to establish a post office or a mail route, in a state, or to lay and collect taxes, or to perform any other federal duty appertaining to this government, must we not solicit the previous consent of the states?

The senator from Virginia argues that, in making such a bank as he wishes, we only forbear to exercise the power, if we have it, to establish a national bank; that, forbearance to exercise is no abandonment of the power; and that, if his bank does not work well we can hereafter resume the power and make another bank. It is very true that, in consenting to make such a bank as he proposes, we do forbear to exercise the power to establish a national bank; for there is quite as much difference between his bank and a national, as there is between any other local bank; any state bank, and a national bank. Just as much difference as there is between a bank of the District of Columbia and a bank of the United States. As a general proposition, it may be true that forbearance to exercise power is not tantamount to the surrender of the power. But there may be, on the other hand, such marked and palpable evidence that the voluntary forbearance to exercise a given power amounts to a virtual surrender of that power. And I think the bank question is such a case. It has been contested for fifty years, and variously decided. During the last eight or ten years the contest has been conducted with the greatest zeal and earnestness, not to say bitterness. The defeated party, not much short of a moiety of the nation, stoutly denies, as a party, the power. Now, if the triumphant party, at the close of the contest, refuses to exercise the power, will it not be hereafter construed as a virtual or implied relinquishment of the power? If that party, moreover, declining to exercise the power, puts forth in lieu, but in the name of a national bank, a sickly, inflexible, unpopulous local bank, which, I think, cannot fail to disappoint the hopes and expectations of the people, how could you afterwards resume the relinquished power? Why, the people would become so disgusted with the very name of bank of the United States, that they would not allow you to resume the power. The senator tells us that if his experiment fail, we may then make a bank after the old model. Why, sir, what have we been struggling against for the last eighty years? Experiment after experiment, until our country has been brought to the very brink of ruin. And, at the very moment when we have not merely seen laid, but got, as all had hoped, into a safe port; when storms, and tempests, and experiments were at an end, and the bright sun of hope and prosperity was beaming upon our joyful vision, the senator from Virginia comes forward and asks us once more to put to sea with him on a distant and perilous cruise, and to try another experiment! The proposition which requires the consent of a state to establish a branch of a bank, if it proceeds upon the erroneous assumption that the branch is introduced for the sole benefit of a particular state. But that is not the case. It is put there for the benefit of the union, including the particular state. If the federal power to establish a branch exists, it ought to be exercised for the common benefit of the union; if there be no such power, then the branch ought not to be clandestinely introduced into a state. But do, Mr. President, see how the senator is evading the consequences of his own senator's proposed amendment. It is a part of that amendment, that, when an office of discount and deposit is once established in a state with the consent of the state, the office shall not be withdrawn without the assent of congress. Now, if your power be incompetent to plant an office of discount and deposit within the limits of a state without the consent of the state, how, after it is put there, can you hold and maintain it there in spite of and against the will of the state?

[Here Mr. RIVES interposed and said that, it was a part of the compact made between the sovereign state and the bank.]

Mr. CLAY continued. Suppose it is, whence do you derive your authority to enforce any contract made between a sovereign state and a corporation? If you are forbidden by the constitution to place a branch in a state, can you delegate such an authority? Can you, in other words, delegate what you have not to a corporation. Forbidden to effect an object, directly, can you achieve it indirectly?

The project of the senator from Virginia proceeds upon the supposition that the constitution has not granted any power to congress to establish a national bank, and, therefore, a branch is admitted within a state, it is there in virtue of the will, under the authority of the laws, and subject to the jurisdiction of that state. It is consequently amenable to and may be dealt with by, the power of the state against which the branch was created by a foreign power.

The senator inquired if it were not competent to Great Britain in what if she pleased the establishment of a branch or office of a bank of the United States within her limits? Most undoubtedly she may; and, therefore, a branch is admitted by the admission of such a branch by a state. Upon the supposition of the admission of such a branch, would it not be subject to the parliament of Great Britain? Could the fact that the corporation whose branch was thus created was created by a foreign power, reign, exert any restraint upon its power, or of the British parliament in dealing as it pleased with the alien or emigrant branch which it had thus received? The branch located within the state by the consent of the state, to a national bank, would be a local institution, governed by the local laws. That, I think, would be the case of any branch unconditionally admitted by the legislature of a state. But if you organize a bank within the District of Columbia, and then, by a subsequent act, announce to the states that branches can only be admitted within their limits by their consent and authority, you necessarily invoke the several states to deliberate on the question of admission which they shall think upon to give or withhold, as they may choose or not choose, according to their opinion, they may consent absolutely or upon conditions, according to the views which they may happen to take, not of the interest of the whole union, but of their several compartments. Thus a power which, if it exist, beyond all question was delegated for the general good, and to be exercised by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, is devolved upon each of twenty-six state legislatures, to be executed according to their respective opinions of the interests of each of them.

And can it be doubted that the consent of the several states (if indeed any of them did consent) would be coupled with various restrictions and conditions, according to what they might deem best for their several communities? The taxing power would probably be insisted upon by all of them.

The bank would be told, yes, you may establish a branch, but you must pay the same tax that the local bank pays, and you must be no stronger within our borders and let him fare better than the natives. And who could withstand the force of that argument before the people of any state in the union? Other conditions would be sought to be imposed, such as the nature of the business to be transacted by the branch, the rules of exchange, the denomination of notes, the participation of the state authorities in the direction, &c. A fruitful source of contention, in some states, would be the mode of the payment of the branches, as have seen the terminus or commencement of canal, or rail road or Macadamized road, distracting and agitating a whole state.

Another question of great importance would be the degree of the protection which the branches would enjoy in its several states which might admit them. Concede the power of congress to establish a national bank, and the right to protect its existence and its operations necessarily results to congress. If the power to establish a branch is wholly dependent upon the states. The committee have inserted in this bill adequate provisions to punish counterfeiters of the issues of the bank, and its officers, agents and servants, who may embezzle its funds, or who may be guilty of any crime, or be effectual, on the supposition of the assistance, in the federal government, of a power to establish a national bank; but, if no such power exist, or if existing, you forbear to execute it, these provisions will be all their force and effect. For congress cannot, if it is not authorized to establish, or does not mean to establish a national bank, pass penal laws operating beyond the territory of this District. The enactment of penal legislation, operating to deprive a man of his life or property, the right to imagine exercise of human authority. Congress cannot extend its protection of the banks of the District of Columbia beyond the limits of the District into the limits of the states. These alone must afford them protection, or they would there be legal protection. Now, what would be the condition of this fiscal bank as to crimes committed against it in the states? In the states adjoining branches? In the states refusing the admission of branches?

My friend from Virginia has argued to prove that congress possesses the power to make such a bank as this; that when it is brought into existence by the authority of congress, its corporate capacity is complete; and that congress may invest it with the privilege of contracting with the states, or the introduction of its officers. When introduced, he thinks the purposes of its institution may be accomplished. There is no doubt, I repeat, that congress may create such a bank; but it is, nevertheless, nothing more nor less than a bank of the District of Columbia. If the officers of its agency action, through officers or agencies situate beyond the District, that exterior action would not result from the legislation of congress, but from the legislation of the states by which their consent was granted to establish the officers within their limits. And the states would have just as much a right to allow of these offices or agencies, whether there was any grant from congress or not to the corporation, in its charter, to establish them. For there can be no logical pretense, that the bank of the Metropolis might now establish such an office or agency in any state that would permit, notwithstanding the silence of its charter on that subject. The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, it has been established, that in its agency in other states, which must have depended solely upon the toleration of their laws.

No amendment to the charter, made by the committee, has commanded from the senator from Virginia warmer commendation than that which he has given to the parent bank. All power of discounting within the District, and compels it to transact that part of the business of banking, through its offices, beyond the District. Considered as a national bank with branches, emanating from and protected by the states by the national authority, I think that the feature is worthy of all the senator's admiration. But if it is to be regarded as a mere District bank, springing from the power of local legislation possessed by congress, it would be certainly a most anomalous, if not a ridiculous feature. In this view, congress will have made, in virtue of its local power, or of legislation, a great District bank, which is strip of all essential power of banking within the District, and transmits all of its important business beyond the boundaries of the District. We shall have made a mere of power, indeed, with a body destitute of life, animation or action where it abides, but which may throw out all around it into the states its long and huge paws or branches to conduct the most extensive operations thereof. Mr. President, is this such a national bank as the people of the United States expect from congress?

The senator from Virginia has invoked a spirit of concession, compromise and conciliation in our deliberations. I have, indeed, in this view, been heretofore found wanting in yielding to the influence of such a spirit. But there are some cases of principle which admit of no compromise, and I fear that this is one. The question is a national bank or no national bank, constitutionally or constitutionally, power, or no power. There are two opposite properties or qualities to be reconciled or compromised? There is no mean or middle term. If you establish a really national bank, emanating from, sustained and protected by the power of congress, and operating within its limits without their consent or control, those who deny the existence of the constitutional power of congress to construct such an institution are dissatisfied and think they are called upon to yield every thing. And, on the other hand, if you establish a mere District bank, with branching powers in the states dependent upon their will, the friends of the constitutional power of congress think that you mock the people with an incompetent institution, and call upon them to surrender every thing.

And this, it seems to me, is the sort of concession or compromise which the senator from Virginia calls upon us to make—a concession of every thing on our side, and nothing on his—a compromise in which he gets all and gives nothing! We were extremely glad, Mr. President, to find the honorable senator, although under another respect, agreeing with the friends of the bill, that great change in the administration of the general government which commenced on the 4th of March last. Some of us indulged the hope that, profiting by the illustrious example of his lamented neighbor, Jefferson, Mr. Monroe, he might come to the conclusion that the bank power was no longer an open or disputable question; but, if he could not agree with them and us, we hoped that other instances, on important measures, of concurrence of opinion between us, might compensate for this difference. For one, I was disposed to leave the senator in the undisturbed possession of his opinion, hoping that, if he could not unite with us in establishing an effectual national bank, we might do without his vote on that question. But I would ask him if he be kind or right in him to seek to disturb us in the quiet enjoyment of our opinions? If he cannot come to the twenty-six or twenty-seven which senators, who believe that congress has the constitutional power to establish a national bank, desire to establish, he is to establish them? Is not such a process against all the laws of gravitation?

[Here Mr. Rives said the amendment he proposed was reported by the secretary of the treasury.]

That is true, and the senator is entitled to all the benefit he can derive from that fact. I feel quite sure, however, that the secretary does not entertain a different opinion of the constitutional power of congress to establish the bank, than I do. I trust the senator from Virginia to forbear pressing his amendment, and, if he cannot give up his own peculiar opinion, to leave us in the undisturbed enjoyment of our long-cherished convictions.

He thinks, indeed, that the bank power is a question not so firmly settled, by repeated decisions, as I have supposed it to be. Why, sir, how stands the matter? Twenty-seven years ago, Mr. Madison considered and treated it as a settled question. After that, the new bank of the United States was established, which lasted twenty years. During its existence, two decisions of the supreme court of the United States, (the bank with the state of Ohio, and McCulloch vs. Maryland, involving the taxing and the power of the states), one, if no both, unanimously pronounced, affirmed the existence of the power. In congress, in 1822, a bill passed by considerable majorities to recharter the bank. Public opinion, in all the various modes of its manifestation, in the assemblies and in popular meetings, has proclaimed the constitutionality and expediency of a national bank. It is not true that the re-election of Gen. Jackson was a decision adverse to the bank power; for, in his veto of the recharter, he admitted the utility of a bank, and stated that, applied to the country, it would have done better. He was voted for, therefore, by large numbers—in my personal knowledge, he was by many—under a full expectation that, if re-elected, a national bank would be established. In the case of Mr. Van Buren's election, the single question of bank or no bank was not fairly put in issue. It was mixed up with others, and one, if not two of his competitors, were not understood to be unconditionally in favor of the power.

It has been argued that we must incorporate this amendment in the charter, and pass it as such, or we shall get no bank; and situations have been distinctly made to opinions entertained elsewhere. I do not think that it is compatible with the respect which is due to the chief magistrate, or to the dignity of independence of the executive, to play the allusion. Whatever inferences gentlemen may have felt themselves at liberty to draw, I am perfectly confident that the president has given authority to no one to say how, in a given contingency, he would act. Such a gratuitous intimation, in advance, on a question of such delicacy and difficulty, I think I am not mistaken when I say his sense of official propriety would restrain him from making. And my confidence in the patriotism and honor of the president, and in his devotion to the cause which brought him into power, is so great, that I feel perfectly persuaded that he cannot fail to look at any measure which congress may mature, and present to his consideration, with an anxious desire, if he can, to conform his judgment to the sense of the legislative assembly. I will say, for the reason already assigned, advert to the facts and circumstances on which I indulge hope, and from which I draw inferences various from those which have been expressed.

But, sir, is it quite certain that such a bank as the senator from Virginia would alone make it really better than no bank? All must feel that the bank controversy has had sufficient duration and sufficient bitterness. It should be the desire of all to see it terminated, and harmony once more restored, if not forever, at least for a period of twenty years. Pass an old fashioned bank, with only such improvements as the experience has actually demonstrated to be necessary; such a bank as the people want and demand; such as the committee have reported, and I believe, in less than six months, that we shall have on this subject tranquility and acquiescence. For, sir, notwithstanding threats by our political opponents to attempt to repeal the law, making such an appeal to the moral judgment of mankind. But if they do, it is impossible for me to doubt the issue of such a contest.

Are we sure that if we pass a bank, whose operations are wholly dependent upon the separate movement of twenty-six states, we shall secure the desired repose? I fear not. I fear that such an institution will be but the commencement of our bank trouble; be but the vestibule of the bank controversy, second thoughts will restrain them from making such an appeal to the moral judgment of mankind. But if they do, it is impossible for me to doubt the issue of such a contest.

What is to be done in this unpleasant state of things? The path of duty lies broad, straight and straight before us. We have convictions, strong and unshaken convictions, of what ought to be done. And these convictions coincide with the opinions and the wishes of the people. The theory of our government, the spirit of our constitution, and the general public sentiment, indicate that the legislative and executive departments of government should be independent and uncontrolled in their respective spheres of action, the one by the other. Can we give up our dearest judgments, and make a presumption of what may be the judgment of others? No, sir; that is too great a sacrifice to ask of independent freemen, representing independent and enlightened freemen. Our true course is, to mature the measure, according to all the lights of our understanding, and the sense of the dictates of our best judgments, and transmit it as perfect as, in our consciences, we can make it, to the co-ordinate branch of the government. Upon receiving it, his duty, his responsibility, his rights will accrue; and, among the many, the most precious is, the examining the measure with all the freedom and independence which belong to his high station.

Let us hope for concurrence between the two departments of government; but if there should not be their concurrence would not be the greatest of calamities—a greater would be a voluntary surrender of sacrifice of the conscientious judgment and constitutional independence of the one to the other. If, after both have acted, there should be any discrepancy, and the one of the offices dictators of the exact point of difference will be seen; and then in a spirit of mutual liberality and concession, some measure may possibly be devised which will obviate all difficulties. I will not anticipate any disagreement in opinion between the legislative and executive authorities; but if it should unfortunately occur, it will not be the first instance of the kind, nor upon this bank subject, in our history. If, in the midst of a disastrous war, president Madison and congress should not agree, or the project of nationalizing a bank of the United States, and their disagreement did not seriously affect the public interests, surely, if, unfortunately, we must, I hope we may differ in a season of profound peace, in respect to the proper constitution of such an institution, and the decision of any irremediable evil upon our country.

Mr. PAXTON, following Mr. CLAY, said: I most earnestly hope, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the senator from Virginia will secure the action of the body. I have given to it all the reflection which its importance demand, and it is the clear conviction of my judgment that, all circumstances considered, we ought to concur in its adoption.

In the consideration of this subject, it is indispensable to look at the position in which the majority is placed, and to be governing in our decision by practical results rather than by theoretical opinions.

What, sir, are the circumstances by which we are surrounded? After a struggle unexampled in the history of parties, in which, for a series of years, opposing principles were arrayed against each other, the late battle has been fought and the victory won; the people have pronounced the condemnation of those measures which have been here so long and strenuously resisted; and it now becomes our duty to carry their will into effect.

The incompetency of the state banks to subserve the purposes of the government, equalize exchanges, and furnish a currency of uniform value throughout the Union, was brought in the late canvass prominently before the people and urged with great ability; and, although the inclination of my judgment was in favor of a fair experiment of this system under propitious circumstances, it seems to be the opinion of high authority that the people have pronounced its condemnation.

That the sub-treasury system has also been universally and unequivocally condemned can admit of no doubt. It has fallen with its own weight, and carried these with it who brought it into being.

It would be necessary for some bank agency in carrying on the commercial exchanges of the country was, however, among the whig party, universally admitted. I myself could not doubt it. It would be just as rational to forego the improvements of agriculture and subvert the whole of our language as now, in a commercial age and a commercial country, to adhere exclusively to a metallic currency, and forgo the facilities of banking agencies.

Banks, in some form, have become as indispensable to the commercial world, as the atmosphere itself is necessary to animal existence.

But, although the banking agency is most certainly demanded by the people, the form in which it shall be exercised may justly admit of some diversity of opinion.

In this uncertainty on a matter of detail—a mere question as to the best form in which the banking power shall be exercised—we assemble here. The president, in his message, declares his readiness to acquiesce in any measure proposed by representatives of the people, consistent with his constitutional obligations and now to unite in some measure for the purpose of carrying into effect the popular will, becomes our immediate duty.

Among the means presented for ascertaining the best mode to carry the popular will into effect the recommendations of that department, specially charged with the general finances and currency of the country cannot be pretermitted.

The senate having called upon the secretary of the treasury to furnish a plan most suitable in his opinion, for remedying the evils of a deranged currency, he submits his project. It comes to us, by the authority of the secretary, and by his own requisition, and in a manner the most formal.

The plan of the treasury, thus fairly before us, has received numerous and essential modifications by the committee to whom it has been referred, and to one of these modifications only the senator from Virginia dissents.

In either mode, it is believed that most of the existing evils will be remedied. Shall we hazard their continuance by refraining from the adoption of either? Is it expedient to employ any countermeasures, to entrench the execution of measures to our unwilling backs and adverse opinions? Will slight grounds justify a difference among those upon whose harmony and union interests of the highest magnitude depend? Is it expedient to expose the nation to the risk of a civil war, which, if it cannot be better to forego a possible advantage, which may only be gained by the sacrifice of that unity of action between the executive and legislative branches of the government, upon which, in our complicated system, so many vital interests depend?

Considering, then, the operation of the bill, as reported by the committee, and as proposed to be modified by the senator from Virginia, I cannot conceive that a case exists that would authorize a difference among those united together against a common avil.

It is said, however, that the amendment proposed by the senator from Virginia is but a continuance of those experiments under which the country has groaned, and which have eventuated in the stagnation of commerce, the loss of property and a deranged currency. But, sir, are not many of the provisions of the bill, as reported by the committee, entirely new? Are they not, therefore, experiments? Is not the abandonment of a great commercial emporium, and the location of the mother bank in the District of Columbia, an experiment? Is not the proposed limitation of 7 per cent. dividends, and the application of the surplus as an available fund to supply a contingent fund, an experiment? Are there not other departures from any previous mode, more experiments, sanctioned, it may be, by our judgments now, but remaining to be tested by experience? Why, then, the alarmed attempt to be excited against another departure, not, perhaps, greater, or even vital, than those of which we have already been approved? All concur in establishing a bank of the United States. The existing difference is one of mere detail. If a probability exists that the other department may be reformed by the amendment proposed, are subordinate considerations to drive us from this object?

I bring my mind to the single point? Is the machine practical? Will it effect the objects for which it is designed? Who will venture to say that it will not? The executive branch of the government has given its opinion that it will. The senator from Virginia concurs in this opinion. I hope it will. Shall I then not try for the sake of harmony and peace? Should it succeed, our object is accomplished; should it fail, the evils of which we are united strength remains unimpaired. The importance of this harmony and union is too great, in my judgment, to be lightly thrown away. To preserve it, I would hazard nothing, endure much.

It would be hazardous to the consequences of a different course. May we not by division and contention among ourselves, defer, if not entirely defeat, the adoption of measures indispensable to the public prosperity, and importantly demanded at our present juncture, leaving our country in a deplorable place, the reins of power in the hands of those whose former policy has brought the country to the brink of ruin, and whose future action in the same career, if we may judge from the past, suggest the nation's destruction, perhaps the ruin of what we so long deplored? I confess, sir, I cannot contemplate this contingency without dismay. I would consider it fraught with unutterable calamity. A trading commerce, a fettered navigation, industry everywhere paralyzed, and domestic pursuits the union are but the harbingers of ills which may now be entailed upon the land. To avoid these results, by mutual concession and liberal forbearance, should be regarded as a paramount duty, a common object; to prevent a catastrophe which will fill many a patriot with anguish and mortification, I shall think myself justified in making almost any sacrifice.

It is said, sir, that I hoped the bill under discussion, as modified by the senator from Virginia, would be productive of good. It at least comes to us recommended by those into whose hands have been committed the finances of the country. But suppose, sir, that it were to fail? Suppose, sir, that still we have not gained the benefit of experience? Will not the adoption of some other measure be the worse apparent? Having made this concession to the scruples of the conscientious, or the fears of the timid, let us, sir, let us consider the course of the country since spontaneously and irresistibly to the adoption of means by which stability and value shall be imparted to the currency of the country? If an institution invested with the powers of the old bank of the United States should be put by experience to be the only expedient by which the essential ends of government can be attained, let it, in the name of our common country, be adopted. But in the meantime, until this creative necessity shall be satisfied, let us, sir, let us reject the trial of the same institution in a modified and some less objectionable form.

At an important crisis, like the present, when harmony and union can alone carry you triumph, let us, sir, let us unite in a common course of moderation, it is, in my judgment, preferable to two measures, and wisdom dictates to all conciliation and forbearance. Is it not better to approach the object of pursuit by advances gradual but certain, rather than to rush precipitately into a precipitous bound? In the consideration of this subject, each of us ought not to forget that there are others whose co-operation is not less essential than our own; that something is due to the laudable desire which all must feel to preserve reputation unimpaired for uniformity in opinion and conduct, and that every generous, honorable impulse should incline us to appreciate the motive which seeks to preserve the moral power of an untarnished name, and to shun the self-abasement which is often the consequence of variable conduct and inconsistent opinions.

Impelled, then, by liberal liberality to others which, in like circumstances, we should desire to see extended to ourselves, let us unite in a common ground, and march together in the re-employment of the objects for which we are convened.

It is for these reasons that I am induced to give a cordial support to the amendment proposed by the senator from Virginia. It promises the attainment of the objects of a fiscal agent, and presents a common platform upon which all may unite.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

August 5. Mr. Benton presented the proceedings of a large and highly respectable assemblage held in Fauquier county, Virginia, protesting against the extra session as unconstitutional, and against a national bank, as unconstitutional, and denying that it was made an issue before the people during the late presidential election, and maintaining that it was the duty to wage deadly and unceasing war until its repeal was effected, promising at the same time, that congress had full power to repeal the charter whenever the majority chose to do so; also, against the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, against an increase of the tariff, and against a national bank, and giving thanks to the democratic members for their patriotic exertions during the present session in endeavoring to resist those measures.

Mr. Benton expressed his full concurrence in the sentiments expressed in the document, and he was prepared to show, when the proper time came, that more decisions had been made against the constitutionality of a national bank than in its favor. If gentlemen wished to express their opinions on this subject, they had an opportunity to do so. He would move to lay the document on the table, and that it be printed.

Mr. Dreher had no objections to the printing. He would not discuss the subject, as this was not the proper time, when the time would come, he was prepared to give his opinions on some of the sentiments contained in the document. It had been said that it proceeded from a large and respectable portion of the citizens of Fauquier. Without, however, denying the proposition, he would only say that he had seen in a newspaper published in the place where the meeting was held, an express avowal that the whole number of persons present was only 100, which assertion would scarcely have been made without a knowledge of its truth. One of the most conspicuous gentlemen in the neighborhood, who were present at the meeting, dissented from the leading provisions, and withdrew from the meeting. It yet was proposed to send forth these resolutions, and to have them printed in Virginia on some of the most important questions that ever came before any deliberative assembly.

Mr. Miller contended that, pending the late presidential contest, a national bank was an issue made before the people. It was not a question of mere merit of measures, and a vast majority of the people had decided in favor of the establishment of a national bank. Did senators, when they spoke thus earnestly, sincerely, and in favor of a repeal, mean to say that no faith nor trust was to be reposed in a solemn act of congress? If they did, in what a light must they present themselves before a Christian community and the civilized world.

Mr. White said that the practice of printing private memorials had been growing since he had been a member of the senate until it had become their duty to arrest it. A great expense in that way was daily accumulating without any corresponding advantage to our counsels or to the public interest, and he was willing in such cases to make a just discrimination, and would vote to prohibit memorial having reference to any specific and important question of public policy pending before the senate, which was drawn in respectful terms and with a benevolent purpose. He could not, however, consent to print and circulate to the public domain a paper like the present, which purported to be a treatise upon matters and things in general, most of which had passed from the consideration of the senate. If the senator from Missouri wished the memorial to be printed, he would use it in reference to the report of the secretary of the treasury, would "dissect" its various contents, he would cheerfully aid in giving the proper disposition to the paper, but would not contribute, by his vote, to print consecrating to a document which attempted to barter a policy so intimately connected with the interests of his constituents as the tariff, by a declaration that "the south would pay it and the north would not." He would use it as a document to the spirit of our institutions, and would advance dreadfully and implacable war against the constitutional acts of congress. Mr. W. said he could see no merit in the present document to entitle it to more. Large sums are allowed to the large mass of private memorials, which are read and referred with, but being printed.

Mr. Allen would ask the yeas and nays on the question, in order to ascertain what really was the opinion of the majority of the senate in relation to the matter. If he understood the remarks of the senators, they went to deny the power of congress to repeal laws which had been enacted by its predecessors; and the people, fearing the danger of such political heresies, had asserted the right to tell their agents, "if you do this, we will change our agents and their measures when we obtain a majority;" and because they thus loudly speak, their agents insolently arrogated to themselves the power to exclude their masters from the right of declaring their sentiments; and this was the English of the whole matter.

Mr. Clay hoped the document would not be printed. There was no occasion for it, as the subject was not now before them, the bank bill having passed the senate. If it became a law, and the question of repeal was raised, he would be ready to support the printing of such documents, and gentleman might come on with their "repeal" as soon as they pleased; he would meet them on it, and they would be frowned down by the universal feelings of an indignant community. He moved to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, hoped the senator would withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. Clay. I will not.

Mr. Benton. There is no objection to the moment it is laid down.

Mr. Clay. Well, get a majority to sustain you, if you can.

Mr. Benton. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the vote stood for laying it on the table as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Phelps, Fort, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Southern, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Claiborne, Eaton, King, Linn, McKelven, Nicholson, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—30.

Mr. Benton. I now move to take it up, and give notice to the senate, that I will move the proposition every morning during the session, till it is taken up. He was proceeding to speak of the subject, when

Mr. Clay called the senator to order.

Mr. Benton. Take down the words.

Mr. Clay. I will take down no words. I make the point of order. The member has no right to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. Benton. I can only say that I consider this attempt the most portentous.

Mr. Clay. I call the senator to order.

Mr. Benton. Take down the words. Take down the words.

Mr. Clay. The point of order is that on a proposition to take up, or lay on the table, it is not in order to discuss the merit of the subject.

Mr. Linn would like to know the nature of this case. The senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton), had moved to print the paper. The senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) had moved to lay the matter on the table. Now he considered this motion relating to the question here before them, which was the motion to print. This had been laid on the table, and the paper now remained before them, open to discussion. He appealed to the president, if that was not the case.

The president so understood it, that it was the motion to print which had been laid on the table, and this carried with it the motion to print.

Mr. Calhoun and the question was still on the memorial; that was not disposed of, and the senator had a right to speak at large on the subject.

Mr. Walker and the chair had decided differently on another occasion. The motion to print, being laid on the table, did not carry the paper with it. The case of abolition petitions was precisely analogous.

The president drew a marked distinction in the case of abolition petitions, and that before them. The motion to revive in the one case was ordered to lie; here, the paper has been received and entertained.

After some further discussion, in which excitement was manifested, by Messrs. Calhoun, Clay and Benton.

Mr. Cuthbert asked, given granting the senator from Missouri to be out of order—(Mr. Benton, I do not allow that)—should any thing stir discussion? Was it or just? He believed that the subject was settled before the body, and regretted to see the ebullitions of passion manifested by the senator from Kentucky.

Mr. Clay (bowing good humoredly). With all due deference to the opinions of the senator, I think the ebullitions of passion are manifested by the other side.

Mr. King gave his opinion, that the motion to print being laid on the table, did not carry the document with it, and that the senator from Missouri had a right to discuss the subject.

Mr. Benton would not take his seat until the chair had decided.

The chair had decided; if that decision was erroneous, it remained for the senate to decide.

Mr. Phelps asked if the subject was still debatable, after the chair had decided, and no appeal was taken?

Mr. Benton appealed from the decision of the chair.

After some remarks by Mr. Tappan, Mr. Clay moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. Benton. The yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. Buchanan asked the nature of the question.

Mr. Benton, made a point, and gave the appeal, being a privileged question, could not be laid on the table.

After further conversation by Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, and Cuthbert, it being fifteen or twenty minutes after eleven.

Mr. Tallmadge suggested to the chair, whether, under the rule, it was now in order, to take up the unfinished business. And accordingly this subject was then laid over.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, from the committee on finance, on that reported the house bill relating to duties and drawbacks, with amendments; which were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. King, the bill to extend for ten years the charter of the Mechanic's Relief society of Alabama, was taken up, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the bill to revive and continue in force, the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, was taken up, the motion pending being to recommit the bill.

Mr. Mangum withdrew the motion.

The question then being on the third reading of the bill, after a few remarks by Mr. Benton in opposition, and by Mr. Merrick in favor of it, it was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Evans, Felton, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Phelps, Fort, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Southern, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Linn, McKelven, Nicholson, Pierce, Sturgeon, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Southern, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright—15.

Thus the bill was passed.

The fortification bill was taken up, the question being on its passage.

After a brief remark by Messrs. Prentiss, Preston, Mangum and Phelps, the question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Claiborne, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Evans, Felton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Linn, McKelven, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Munton, Phelps, Fort, Sumner, Preston, Rivers, Sever, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Southern, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Nicholson, Pierce, Woodbury—4.

The navy pension bill was then taken up, as in committee of the whole.

The motion pending was the following amendment offered by Mr. Walker to the amendment of Mr. Woodbury:

"And provided, also, that the pensions authorized under the act of 30th June, 1834, be, and the same are hereby, continued in force until otherwise ordered by the acts of congress."

The amendment of Mr. Woodbury was to add to the 1st section the following:

"Provided that no part of this money shall be applied to the payment of any pensions not entitled under the acts of congress as they existed prior to the year 1837."

Mr. Choate rose to address the senate—

When Mr. Walker withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Choate went into the merits of the amendment, offering considerable length, in which he contended that the pensions could not now be withdrawn without manifest injustice to the pensioners, and a breach of faith in the government.

Mr. Woodbury followed at some length in favor of his amendment, which a general debate ensued, in which Messrs. Huntington, Calhoun, Evans, Wright and Williams participated.

Mr. Walker then moved to amend the amendment so as to read—

"That all widows, or children of all naval officers, rearms and marines now deceased, and entitled to receive or make proof of their pensions under the act of 31 March, 1837, shall receive the same until otherwise directed by law, but no widow or child of any naval officer, seaman or marine who may be deceased, shall be entitled to any pension by virtue of any provision in the said act."

On this motion, a debate of some length occurred, in which Messrs. Sevier, Bates, Woodbury, Prentiss, Calhoun, Walker, Mangum, Buchanan and Cuthbert took part.

The question on the adoption of Mr. Walker's amendment was decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 16.

Mr. Calhoun then moved a proviso to the following effect, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to make the pensions under the act of 1837 chargeable upon the treasury.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 28.

Mr. Williams moved to add a proviso to the effect that no pensioner who has received a pension for five years shall be entitled to receive under this act.

On this proposition a debate ensued in which Messrs. Bates, Mangum, Huntington, Pierce, Williams, and others, participated.

And, the question being taken, the vote was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, King, and McKelven, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Barrow, Berrien, Claiborne, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Fort, Preston, Rivers, Sevier, Sumner, Smith, of Ind., Southern, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—36.

Mr. Williams then moved to amend the bill, by adding as a third section the following:

Sec. 3. Be it enacted, That an act entitled "an act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund," passed 3d March, 1837, be, and the same is hereby repealed; and that the amount of pensions for disabilities, and to widows, and children of officers, seamen and marines, shall be regulated by the pay of the navy as it was on the 1st May, 1836, and commence when the proof establishing the pension shall be completed."

And this question was pending when the senate adjourned, after a session of nearly seven hours.

August 6. The unfinished business of yesterday morning was taken up, being in relation to the proceedings and resolutions of the meeting of citizens of Pasquot county, Virginia, presented by Mr. Benton.

The question pending, was on the motion of Mr. Clay, and yeas 19, to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the chair, which was taken by Mr. Benton.

A discussion on points of order, by various senators, arose, and was protracted sometime beyond the expiration of the morning hour, and then lay over till to-morrow.

Mr. Huntington, from the committee on commerce, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby authorized to cause the light-house now stationed at Sandy Hook to be removed, and to be placed near Bardens reef in Long Island Sound; and the light-house now at Bardens reef to be removed and placed near Execution rocks in Long Island Sound.

The navy pension bill was then taken up, and after a brief remark by Mr. Choate, the question was ordered by Mr. Williams, of Maine, relating to the introduction of a third section, going to repeal the act of 1837, and making the amount of pensions to widows and children of officers, seamen and marines regulated by the pay of the navy as it was in May, 1836, in which Messrs. Mangum, Walker and Williams participated.

The question was then taken on its adoption, and decided in the negative: yeas 19, nays 28.

Mr. Calhoun then moved an amendment, to strike out the words "seamen and marines," and to provide that the widows and children of officers, seamen and marines, now on the pension roll, under the act of 1837, shall receive their pensions until otherwise directed by law, but none shall be hereafter added to said list, and act as any other, except those of April 2d, 1809, and January 14, 1813, and the second section of the act of 4th March, 1814.

Mr. C. said it must be admitted on all hands that the act of 1837 was not only wrong in principle, but also in fact, as the pension law had went on to show the defects of the law and the abuses which had crept in under it.

The question having been taken on the amendment, it was decided in the negative: yeas 20, nays 24.

Mr. Buchanan then offered an amendment, which was adopted, to strike out the words "until other wise directed by law," and insert "until the close of the next session of congress."

And the bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

The bill from the house, "to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant premium rights," was taken up.

Mr. Smith, of Ind. chairman of the committee on public lands, rose and addressed the senate for upwards of two hours, presenting the subject in a clear and strong point of view. After Mr. S. had concluded, Mr. Linn suggested the propriety of now offering the amendments, and perfecting the bill, before further discussion.

Mr. Archer expressed a desire to address the senate on the land question, but in consequence of the hour, and the pressing relations to be settled on, he moved to go into executive session; which motion was adopted; and, after remaining some time therein, the senate adjourned.

August 7. Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from dealers in coarse woollens, asking that coarse wool may be exempted from duty.

Also, from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking that soda ash and bleaching powder be admitted free of duty. As those articles were excepted, he would move to lay the memorial on the table.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the point of order, the question pending being an appeal taken by Mr. Calhoun from a decision of the chair, that a motion to lay an appeal on the table was in order.

On this question a debate of very considerable length ensued, in which Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Evans, Bayard, Prentiss, Walker, Clayton, Buchanan, Linn, King, and others participated. The question was then put, "shall the chair be sustained?" and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky; Clayton, Evans, Merriek, Mill, Morehead, Phelps, Summons, Tallmadge—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McKim, Morehead, Nicholas, Poinsett, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Sprague, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.

The next question was, whether, after a subject had been laid on the table, the motion to take it up was debatable.

Mr. Clay made a point of order, contending that it was not debatable; and he moved Mr. Benton to order on a preceding day when about to give his reasons for taking up a document.

Mr. King contended that a senator, under the rules, might, to a limited extent, give his reasons for wishing to take up a paper that had been laid on the table.

Mr. Clay said if that rule were to prevail there would be no limit to debate on the subject.

Mr. Clayton said if the motion to take up could be debated even to a limited extent, then the motion to lay on the table, which precluded debate, would be a mere nullity.

This question was also debated at length, when the senate decided that it was not debatable, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Merriek, Mill, Morehead, Phelps, Poinsett, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Ind. Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Morehead, Nicholas, Poinsett, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18.

The question then reverted to the original decision of the chair, that a motion to lay the motion to print on the table carried the subject with it, on which Mr. Benton had appealed. After some considerable discussion, the following was put on record:

The president pro tempore announced to the senate that the question raised by the senator from Missouri (Mr. Linn) did not, in his opinion, properly arise on the motion of his colleague (Mr. Benton) to take up the motion to print, and was, therefore, not necessarily to be decided. And the decision stated on the journal of Thursday, as having been made on that question, was not intended as a general parliamentary rule, but was founded on the peculiar state of the question, supposing that the paper had been actually laid upon the table by the practice of the senate, as a matter of course, and thereupon the appeal was withdrawn.

The navy pension bill was then read a third time and passed.

And then the senate adjourned.

August 9. Mr. Chase presented a memorial asking that chloride of lime might not be subject to duty.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Linn some days since, requiring the president to give notice to the British government, agreeably to the convention of 1827, putting an end to the treaty for the joint occupation of Oregon, was taken up, when Mr. Linn announced his intention to offer some remarks on the subject either to-morrow or next day; meantime, he would request that it be passed over informally, which was acquiesced in.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Clay, of Ala. relating to the appointment of additional clerks in the land office, and the grounds on which they were appointed, &c. was taken up, and discussed at length by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Clay, of Ala. Linn, Preston, and Smith; when Mr. Preston offered the following amendment, which was accepted, as a modification by Mr. Clay:

"And the same information, with regard to such increase or diminution during the four years from 1829, the four years from 1833, and the four years from 1837."

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Buchanan, Smith, of Indiana, King, Preston, and others, but before coming to any decision on the resolution, it was on motion of Mr. Smith, of Ind. laid on the table.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, being the bill to appropriate for a limited period the proceeds of the public lands.

On the motion of Mr. Smith, of Ind. several amendments of the committee were adopted.

Mr. Walker moved the following amendment, to be added to the fifth section:

"And be it further enacted, That the two per centum on the net proceeds of the land sold by the United States in the state of Mississippi since the 1st December, 1817, or that may hereafter be sold under the act entitled 'an act to enable the people of the western part of Mississippi territory to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of such state into the union on an equal footing with the original states,' and all acts supplementary thereto, reserved for the making of a road or roads leading to said state, be, and for said net proceeds be, ratiocinated to the state of Mississippi, payable on the 1st day of May after the passage of this act, so far as the same may then have accrued, and quarterly payable, as the same may accrue, after said period: Provided, That the legislature shall not sell the first part of the land until their acceptance of said relinquishment in full of said fund, accrued and accruing; and also, embracing a provision to be unalterable without the consent of congress, that the whole of said two per centum shall be faithfully applied to the construction of a rail road leading from Brandon, in the state of Mississippi, to the eastern boundary of said state, in the direction as near as may be, of the towns of Adams, Cahawbe and Montgomery, in the state of Alabama."

This was debated at some length by Messrs. Walker, Clay, of Alabama, and King, in support, and opposed by Messrs. Evans, White and Smith, of Indiana. It was then adopted; yeas 22, nays 21.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then moved an amendment to the same effect in relation to Alabama.

Which was rejected: yeas 20, nays 22.

Mr. Calhoun offered the following amendment, to be added to the end of the second section:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to convert the distributive shares assigned to the several states into a debt due them, or to prevent congress from repealing this act, whenever it shall deem the public interest to require it, except so far as it may relate to the said grants."

This was advocated by Messrs. Calhoun, Allen, and others, and opposed by Messrs. Smith, of Ind. Woodbridge and Phelps. It was then rejected; yeas 21, nays 25.

Mr. McRoberts moved an amendment, to add in the second article, at the fourth line, after the word "Columbia," the words "and the territory of Wisconsin, Iowa and Florida."

This was advocated by Messrs. Sevier, Wright and Allen, and opposed by Messrs. Huntington, Clay and Smith, of Indiana, on the ground that the government paid the civil expenses of the territories, and also made appropriations for their schools, public buildings, roads, &c. and also that, by the deeds of cession, the lands were granted to the states.

Mr. Woodbridge also opposed it, and Mr. Buchanan said he should be induced to vote against it, in compliance with his instructions.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and rejected; yeas 20, nays 26.

And, after a session of near seven hours, the senate adjourned.

August 10. Mr. Smith, of Indiana, presented a petition of captains and owners of steamboats and others, interested in the trade and prosperity of the whole country generally, and particularly of the western states, very numerous signed, in favor of the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, of the falls, by the construction of a canal on the Indiana side, to the river. Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Evans, two hundred copies of house bill relating to duties and drawbacks were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Benton moved to take up the document presented by him some mornings since, containing the proceedings of the meeting at Fausquier county, which had created the debate on the point of order and appeal from the decision of the chair.

The motion having been agreed to, Mr. Benton moved that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. Clay asked the yeas and nays on the question; and it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Morehead, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Mill, Morehead, Phelps, Poinsett, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge—18.

The bill repealing the sub-treasury having been passed in the house with amendments,

Mr. Clay moved that the bill and amendments be referred to the committee on finance, which motion was adopted, and, on motion of Mr. Tappan, the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Huntington asked the senate to indulge him in taking up the joint resolution relating to the light-boats now stationed at Sandy Hook and Bartlett's Reef, as it would occupy but a moment. The motion having been agreed to, Mr. H. explained the object of the resolution, which was a mere change of location of the boats on the recommendation of experienced pilots and navigators. Mr. H. then offered an amendment to come in at the end of the resolution, which was adopted, and the resolution ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant premium rights.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to strike out in the 4th line of the 1st section the words "in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one," and insert, "next ensuing the complete payment of the public debt, and to be paid by the treasury, contracted under any act of the United States."

Mr. C. grounded this amendment on the objections which he entertained to any distribution of the proceeds of the public lands while the country was in debt and held for additional taxation pending before the legislature.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, said the amendment was fair and honest—it was made with a view to defeat the bill, and the question was simply bill or no bill, distribution or no distribution.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said his proposition did not go to the defeat of the bill, but simply to make it take effect after the country was out of debt.

Mr. Calhoun spoke for some time in favor of the amendment, in which he went into the subject of the finances of the country.

Mr. Clay replied at some length, touching also the finances, and denying that the bill would be any violation of the compromise act.

The debate on this question continued between Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Rivers, Clay, of Ala. Smith, of Ind. Woodbury, Wright, Linn, Buchanan and Woodbridge.

When the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Morehead, Nicholas, Poinsett, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Mill, Morehead, Phelps, Poinsett, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then moved to amend the bill by inserting in the 2d section, line 10, after the word "states," the words "and such sums as may be paid to any Indian tribe for the purchase of any portion of the public lands."

On the taking of the question was taken without debate, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McKim, Morehead, Nicholas, Poinsett, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—36.

Mr. McRoberts moved to strike from the bill that clause which prevented the grant of pre-emption rights until after the surveys shall have been made. Mr. Merr. thought that clause manifestly unjust; survey might be delayed indefinitely.

The amendment was debated by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Lin, Young, Porter and Huntington, and on the question being taken on the amendment, it was decided in the negative. YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Porter, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Wadsworth, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Woodbridge—24.

Mr. Young then moved to strike out that clause which related to the exclusion of the whole.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, explained that the bill simply required the alien to have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, as required by the naturalization laws, to give him all the rights under the bill.

When the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Woodbridge—25.

Mr. Nicholson then moved to exclude the proceeds of the sales of the vacant and unappropriated lands in the state of Tennessee, relinquished to that state on certain conditions.

After some remarks from Messrs. Clay, White and Nicholson, the question was taken, and the amendment was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White—27.

Mr. Graham then moved to amend the bill so as to place among the deductions from the net proceeds to be distributed "any sum apparently due to the United States as balances of debts growing out of the transactions of the revolutionary war."

This proposition was debated at some length by Messrs. Graham, Calhoun, Clay, Tappan, Tallmadge and others, and the question being taken, it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury—19.

Mr. Young then moved to add to the bill additional sections, embracing the graduation principle, and the right of the states to tax the public lands within the territory, instead of allowing them to be exempt for five years, as they are under the present compact.

This was debated at some length by Messrs. Water, Young, Benton and others. A motion was then made to adjourn, but failed; says 19, says 19. The debate was further continued, and the senate adjourned without taking any question.

August 11. Mr. Smith, of Indiana, offered a resolution instructing the committee on post offices and post roads to inquire into the expediency of procuring by law at the present session, to enable the post office department to liquidate the dues from it.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, offered a resolution inquiring of the secretary of the treasury why he has not laid before the senate the information in compliance with a resolution passed last session, calling for the issues of scrip, connected with military land warrants.

Both resolutions lie over one day.

The president laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, giving a list of all articles imported duty free, or bearing a less duty than twenty per cent, at valuations, with the amount of duties paid on, and value of, those articles in 1837, '38 and '39; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Calhoun offered resolutions of a highly respectful and complimentary nature to the citizens of Virginia, condemning in strong terms a national bank, distribution, &c. and maintained the right of "repel" of the bank. He moved the printing of the resolutions, which was negatived, says 19, says 20.

His papers were, after some remarks by Messrs. Calhoun, Benton, Clay, of Ky. Archer and Clay, of Alabama, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Ky. the senate took up the bill for the repeal of the sub-treasury. The question being on concurring in the amendments of the house of representatives.

After some remarks by Messrs. Clay, of Ky. and Calhoun, Mr. Calhoun moved to postpone the subject to Saturday next.

The proposition was advocated by Messrs. Calhoun and Benton, and opposed by Messrs. Clay, of Ky. Priston and Rives, after which the question on postponement was taken, and lost, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—28.

The question then returned on the first amendment of the house, which repeals the act of 1836, "to regulate the deposits of the public money," except the 13th and 14th sections.

The amendment was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Simmons, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

The question was then on the second amendment, which repeals so much of the act of 14th April, 1836, making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensions, as provides that, after the 3d March, 1837, no note of less denomination than twenty dollars shall be offered in payment by the United States or the post office department.

This amendment was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clontie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rivers, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbertson, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—23.

Mr. Lin moved to have being altered so as to be for the repeal of the sub-treasury law, and for other purposes, the amendments were completed.

On motion of Mr. Lin, the bill "to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands and grant pre-emption rights," was taken up; the question being then on the amendment of Mr. Young, offered last evening, embracing the graduation principle, and repealing the law exempting for five years the public land, when sold, from taxation.

After further remarks by Messrs. Smith, of Ind. McRoberts and Benton, the first division of the amendment was rejected: says 16, says 27.

The latter part of the amendment, after remarks by Messrs. Smith, of Ind. McRoberts, and White, was rejected: says 16, says 22.

Mr. Lin moved the amendment, of which he had given notice, and which was printed, to strike out the first nine sections of the bill, which compose the distribution feature, and to insert a provision that the net proceeds of the public lands hereafter sold, and the proceeds of the surveys and debts of government, shall be applied to the common defence of the union, on land and on water, until the U. States are placed in that state of strength and security which is due to the honor and independence of the nation, and the protection of the rights and interests of its citizens; and this to be in addition to the ordinary annual appropriation for such objects.

He took for granted the constitutionality of this manner of disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, and entered at some length into the numerous and pressing reasons for its expediency.

Messrs. Young, of Ark. Nicholson, Smith, of Ind. and King, made some further remarks, in the course of which, it was intimated that the question of engrossment of the bill would be taken to-morrow.

The senate then went into executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, July 23. Mr. Sevier stated that the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union; but yielded the floor to Mr. Adams who said he rose to a question of privilege. A message had been received yesterday from the president of the United States, containing a communication from the French minister to the secretary of the treasury, recommending against a bill pending before congress. The communication had been referred and ordered to be printed yesterday without being read, and he had not, therefore, been aware of its import until this morning. It was a matter of great importance, and, had he been aware yesterday what its character was, he should not have let it pass without expressing his views in regard to it. He proposed now to offer a resolution in something like the following terms:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the house by what authority the minister from France addressed a communication to the secretary of the treasury recommending the passage of a bill now pending before congress.

It was well known (Mr. A. remarked) to every body that understood the relations between citizens of good-will and nations that the organ of communication with the French minister was not the secretary of the treasury, but the secretary of state. The secretary of state was the proper person to whom all communications from foreign ministers were to be made. The impropriety of the proceeding was apparent to every eye, and was the danger of the precedent, if the house should suffer itself to be influenced in such a manner.

Mr. Ingersoll suggested, with great respect for Mr. Adams, that he should make his speech for a day or two. Mr. A. was understood to say that there were only a few hours yet remaining for the consideration of the bank bill, and to submit whether it would not be better to devote that time to it without interruption.

Mr. Adams briefly pointed out the consequences which must result if such a course of proceeding was allowed, but declined imputing any blame to the executive authorities.

A long and irregular debate followed, amidst much confusion, in which many members took part, among whom were Messrs. Adams, Ingersoll, Pickens, Turley, Bates, Underwood and Fillmore. It ended in laying the whole subject on the table, on motion of Mr. Bates. Says 99, says 77.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. John C. Clark, of New York, in the chair), on the bill to incorporate the subscribers to a fire bank of the United States.

The question being on the motion of Mr. McClain to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Pope was entitled to the floor, and addressed the committee during the hour in favor of the bill, but had not quite concluded when the hour had elapsed.

The speaker resumed the chair informally for the purpose of receiving a message from the senate through A. Dickinson, esq. their secretary, informing the house that the senate had passed a bill to revise and continue in force for ten years an act entitled "an act to incorporate the Mechanica's Relief society of Alexandria."

Also, the act "making appropriations for various fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities," with amendments.

Also, an act "to revive and extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia." To all which said bills the senate asked the concurrence of this house. The chairman then resumed his seat.

Mr. Bidwell followed against the bill. Mr. Murrah, of Kentucky, next addressed the committee.

After enjoining in the fullest manner the positions taken by Mr. M. went on to show that, in relation to the constitutional question of the power to create a bank, he stood now where he had in 1837, and he quoted his former speeches and resolutions. He had always held that congress had power to create a national bank, but CONGRESSIONAL. The consideration of the president's veto message to the senate, on returning the bill for establishing a fiscal bank, was postponed, from day to day, by that body, from Monday until Thursday, when, after some debate, the question taken on its passage—the veto notwithstanding—standing—and decided in the negative: ay 25, nays 24—two thirds being required to carry a bill in such a case.

The bankrupt bill, which had passed the senate, and been debated in the house for the last two or three weeks, was so amended on Saturday, as to render it unpalatable to a majority of that body, and a motion to lay it upon the table—equivalent to a rejection—prevailed by a vote of 110 to 97—all the anti-Buren members in the house, except two, voting for the motion. This vote is said to have created almost as much excitement as the veto of the bill. Both houses, thereupon, immediately adjourned. A reconsideration of the vote was next day proposed and carried, by a majority of sixteen votes; the objectionable amendment was then voted and rejected—and the bill then passed the house by a vote of 110 yeas to 106 nays. An amendment, postponing the period at which it is to go into operation to the 1st of February, was immediately assented to by the senate, and the signature of the president was affixed to the bill on Thursday. The time for its going into operation was postponed with a view to allow an opportunity to congress to repeal it before then, should public opinion so determine.

The bill to renew the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, for three years, has also passed the house, by a very large majority, and is now before the president.

The absorbing interest of the topics now occupying the attention of congress, induced us to postpone many articles that must be registered hereafter.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

FRANCE.

Royalty. The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer writes that, at the celebration of the baptism of the count de Paris, on the 9th June, the queen of France, accompanied by the sovereigns of Belgium, the old duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and suite, in his coach, and with a strong escort nearly touching the panels. He came to Versailles on Wednesday last, rather more open to inspection, and seemingly indifferent to the gaze (nothing more) from the gallery and the loungers in the avenues. A most travelling equipage on the day of his ge-turn from his journey of last week. It consisted of two large elegant coaches, eight horses in each, and two baggage coaches with six horses each; the whole splendidly caparisoned on eight or ten mounted liveries, &c. A detachment of lanciers awaited at the gate of the park of St. Cloud his arrival there. When he visits any one of the royal palaces in the neighborhood of the capital, mounted gendarmes are stationed at intervals along the route.

CHINA.

The ship Onida, Smith, arrived at New York, left Canton on the 26th and Macao on the 27th April. Affairs remain much as when the Akbar sailed. Trade still open. No fighting, but an imperial edict has been issued, which is full of war against the English.

There were seven American vessels at Whampoa, and one at Macao, all loading. The ship Commodore sailed on the 28th of April, for Canton, New York, with a full cargo of teas and silks.—Teas were somewhat scarce, in consequence of so many English and American vessels loading.

The following is from the Canton Register of the 20th April.

Circular to her majesty's subjects, British factory, Canton 16th April, 1841. A satisfactory communication has this day been received from his excellency commissioner Yang, declaratory of the faithful intentions of his newly arrived colleagues concerning the arrangement concluded on the 30th ult. between H. E. and the undersigned.

The Kwangchow having also issued a proclamation by desire of their excellencies, intended to remove the trading people, the plenipotentiary has for a like reason (with the concurrence of the government) made public the accompanying notice under his own seal. (Signed) CHARLES ELIOT, H. M.'s plenipotentiary.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Washington Harrow, of Mississippi, charge d'affaires at the court of her most faithful majesty, the queen of Portugal.

Ambrrose Baber, of Georgia, charge d'affaires near the government of Sardinia.

John S. Pendleton, of Virginia, charge d'affaires to the republic of Chili.

James S. Calhoun, of Georgia, consul for the port of Havana.

David Hoffman, of Maryland, commissioners under the act of congress to carry into effect the convention with the Mexican republic of the 11th of April, 1839.

Richard K. Call, governor of the territory of Florida.

United States marshals.

Alexander K. McClung, for the northern district of Illinois.

William Prantiss, for the district of Illinois.

Land officer.

Munford Stokes, register, Fayetteville, Arkansas.

custom house officers—Collectors.

George W. Pearce, Gloucester, Massachusetts.

James K. Livingston, Genesee, New York.

Judith T. Almsworth, Cape Vincent, New York.

Clayton H. Page, Little Egg Harbor, N. Jersey.

Postmasters.

Daniel H. Harris, of Frankfort, Kentucky.

Cyrus Edwards, at Alton, Illinois.

Geo. W. Spotswood, at Springfield, Illinois.

DIPLOMATIC. Isaac Rand Jackson, ex charge d'affaires at Denver, &c. family, embarked on Thursday in the packet ship Toledo, for New York for London.

AMERICAN CONSUL IMPRISONED. Captain Martin's of the bark Iris, in 11 days from Matanzas, reports that Mr. Croes the American consul at that port, had, by order of the governor general of Cuba, been arrested and confined in prison on the day that the bark left. The captain did not learn the particular or basis of any charges that had been made against Mr. Croes, who is represented as an extremely mild and amiable gentleman.

THE TREASURY LOAN. The secretary of the treasury has negotiated $1,000,000 of the loan, lately authorized, being all he is at present proposed for, one million thereof at 53 and 500,000 at 5 1/2 per cent. Of the latter sum, the Merchants' bank of New York, took $150,000; Messrs. Canham, Whitehouse & Co. has $250,000, and Messrs. Keitchum, Rogers & Bement $100,000 for themselves or others.

INDIANS PACIFIED. The Burlington (I. T.) Hawk Eye, says that, in consequence of a visit from governor Chambers to the two parties of the Sacs and Foxes, they have been reconciled to each other, and their past difficulties, it is believed, are fully settled.

PARDON. We learn from the National Intelligencer that the president has granted a pardon to Henry H. White, confined in the penitentiary at Washington under sentence for burning the treasury. If we mistake not he had three tedious trials before a jury could agree—and it now appears by confession of one of the principal witnesses that the facts sworn to against White never existed.—The judges, prosecuting attorney and as many of the jury as could be found as well as a number of respectable citizens of the District joined in petition for his pardon.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

The decisive overthrow of the Melbourne ministry and whig party, in the recent elections in England, was mainly occasioned by their attempt to modify the existing laws in a direction towards "free trade." They proposed not to dispense with, but amend the corn laws in such a manner as to allow the ingress of foreign grain and flour upon more liberal and regular terms than heretofore, and to reduce the duty upon sugar and a few other articles. Nearly the whole agricultural interest of the country was aroused, at once, by the proposition, and throwing their weight into the aristocratic scale, the tory party are elevated to power and the seal is affixed to the introduction of our surplus breadstuffs, unless the British community are, by the failure of their own crops, reduced to the extremity of almost starvation.

It is well for the United States that the policy of the British government is thus distinctly ascertained, before congress were prepared to revise the existing tariff of this country. There is now no doubt as to the measures which we have to encounter abroad. We understand the policy which their interest has induced them to adopt towards us—and we have only to consider how our interest can best be promoted in meeting their prohibitions. They legislate, not in behalf of FREE TRADE—in behalf of Britain. Their aim is to be in behalf of the general interest of the world; of a liberal, fair, open commerce—but in behalf of the monopoly of trade, so far as it can be secured to the benefit of the subject of "her majesty." They take care of themselves—and endeavor to take equal care of ourselves. We should have been glad—as we took occasion to express when the propositions of the Melbourne ministers were first announced in behalf of a modification of their restrictive laws—we should have rejoiced to meet them on that way in the broadest catholicity of benevolence, all, by abandoning, as far as possible, restriction upon commerce. It is true, and we so intimated, that we had but a glimmer of hope that they would seriously and in good faith abandon one inch of advantage they have gained over us in our existing intercourse. Yet we caught willingly even at the professed design of taking such a direction. It appears that it was but to announce such a design in England, and to ensure the defeat of the party so presuming upon British liberality. The remotest gleam of hope, in that direction, is at once extinguished. The contest for our fair share of the trade of the world must be forthwith commenced, and we hope it will be fought out fairly, spiritedly, manfully. The torres come into power upon the ground that the restrictive policy is to be maintained, and maintained it will be—but not without some people having to pay the price of the monopoly. If they can induce the United States to continue, as they have for years past, to verge on towards "free trade," admitting British articles at less and less duty, and, in many cases, free of any duty, to the manifest profit of British manufactures; while on the other hand, they tax American products almost, and often quite, to the point of prohibition; if the American people will submit to a continuance of this system, they will just as effectually be taxed to pay the price of this British monopoly as they could ever have been by submitting to the British stamp tax and tax upon tea, which our fathers resisted in the last century.

That the tort ministry will have great difficulty in surmounting the embarrassments which lie in the path before them, no one, who will review the predicament which compelled the Melbourne ministry to adventure this last expedient for maintaining power, will doubt for a moment. It was by no means a voluntary suggestion of theirs. It was, in fact, a mere expedient to escape from difficulties which they perceived no other method of overcoming. How the new ministers may contrive to surmount those same embarrassments, remains to be ascertained. They say no of trifling import—and whatever expedient they may be driven to resort to may possibly be found as unpalatable to the British people, as was the suggestion of modifying the corn laws. They will find it no easy matter to compensate for the diminution of the West India trade, under the new policy they have adopted, by an "experiment." And, may we hope that they will find it an equally difficult task to reconcile the United States to a continuance of a system which operates to drain the union of from twenty to forty millions of dollars annually, when, by a wise legislation, the trade might be at least equalized.

We are desirous to the doctrine laid down by Thomas Jefferson, when first secretary of state under the federal constitution—that in our intercourse with other countries, it corresponds alike with the honor and the true interest of the United States to extend, to every country, privilege for privilege—and to meet them with restriction for restriction.

PRODUCTION OF COFFEE IN THE WORLD. The British Almanac states that according to an approximate estimate prepared by Mr. McQueen, the quantity of coffee produced in the various countries in which it forms a commercial export is as follows:

	ounds.
Brazil	124,000,000
Cuba and Puerto Rico	49,810,460
Java	40,067,128
Hyli	49,810,460
French tropical colonies	14,720,000
Venezuela and Colombia	11,544,024
Surinam	2,400,000
Mocha	5,500,000
Central America	897,540
British West Indies	10,169,855
British India	6,346,925

The consumption of coffee in Great Britain, during the year 1838, was 12,920,820 lbs. being more

"An article in the last Blackwood, concerning the errors which produced the overthrow of the Melbourne ministry, dwells with force upon what the writer considers their unfortunate and mistaken policy towards the West Indies. "They have first dismissed," says the writer, "by about a third, the total agricultural produce of the British West Indies, and then, in the name of shipping employed between them and the mother country; and then, to fill up the gap, and remedy the deficiency which they themselves have created, they propose to complete the destruction of the British West India islands by an inundation of foreign sugar, which will at once render cultivation in our own colonies impossible."

Another result has been to increase the slave trade in Cuba and Brazil; for the deficiency of the crops in the British West Indies has stimulated production in those other countries, where the slave trade is still in vogue; and since the emancipation act the importation of negroes has risen from one hundred to one hundred and ninety thousand annually.

Lord Palmerston, in his electrifying language at Tiverton, in relation to the British West India colonies, says:—"The West Indies were in a state of great difficulty, owing to the existence of slavery in its colonies. There were 800,000 slaves there—the objects of suspicion to the whites—the source of disturbance on every occasion, and whose compulsory labor, being not equal to the free labor of European workmen, did not supply the owners of estates with a satisfactory and certain source of labor for the cultivation of their lands."

We carried a measure unexampled in the history of the people—we induced parliament to free the British West India colonies to convert 800,000 slaves into free and independent citizens. Thus strengthening the empire at large without in the slightest degree diminishing, but on the contrary increasing the value of the property of those who had been the owners of those slaves. 'I should cheer'."

than double the quantity supposed to be produced by the British West India.

PRODUCTION OF SUGAR IN THE WORLD. The following approximate estimate of the quantity of sugar, produced in different parts of the world, is taken from the British Almanac:

	Cwt.
British sugar colonies	3,571,273
British India	519,128
Danish West India	450,000
Dutch do.	260,000
French sugar colonies	2,160,000
United States	900,000
Brown sugar, quantity of white not distinguished	2,000,000
Spanish West India	481,340
Java (without distinction of quality)	892,474
For internal consumption exclusive

VISIT TO THE U. STATES SHIP DELAWARE. Saturday has been set apart as the day on which the president, the heads of department, members of congress of both houses, together with a select company of invited guests, should pay a visit to the ship Delaware, now lying in the Chesapeake bay, off Annapolis, a town of ease in readiness at the depot in this city to receive them at seven o'clock.

Owing to the pressure of official duties, the president was, to the regret of all concerned, unable to join the party. But the secretaries of the navy, of state and of war, the attorney general, and postmaster general, (the secretary of the treasury being prevented by indisposition), took their places in the cars at the appointed hour, as did many members of congress, especially those from the western states, to many of whom a ship of war was a sight new to be enjoyed for the first time. A few senators also joined the party, as more would no doubt have done had not the senate on Friday, (unexpectedly to many), refused to adjourn over to Monday. The sky, for some time, presented a lowering aspect, and some drops of rain fell soon after the cars had got in motion, but the weather very soon cleared away, the mists proved propitious, and just enough to refresh to make the ride refreshing. The company was mingled without distinction of parties, and all seemed exhilarated by an escape from the routine of official life. The style of the school boys set free, for once at least, from the sound of recitation and the dominion of the rules. The cry of "Mr. Speaker!" was no more heard, for every body spoke at once, (as at certain times within the walls of a certain house, and in the place of the yea and nay bell, was heard the shrill note of the steam whistle, or the hissing and spluttering of the passionate locomotive in the van. A number of ladies, too, (though it was not strictly a part of the plan), graced the cheerful company by their presence and smiles; and the evident pleasure they received from the trip tended much to augment a like feeling in their less susceptible companions.

The country between Washington and Annapolis possesses but few attractions, and every one was rejoiced when the word passed from mouth to mouth, "Here we are!"

That ancient city, venerable as well from its early date as from the spirit-alizing associations with which it is connected, though not large has a picturesque appearance; many of its buildings private as well as public, preserving, unchanged, a model of the style of architecture which presided while Maryland was yet the seat of the colonial government. Among these are the state house, St. John's college, and the Episcopal church, whose lofty brick towers form a striking element in the landscape, visible from every direction. The state house of brick, stands upon a commanding eminence, and is remarkable for its very lofty and highly ornamental dome and cupola from the top of which the star-spangled banner now quietly waved to the breeze. Here we were privileged to stand, and that hollow spot where once we witnessed the most sublime act which human history has recorded; we mean the surrender, by Washington, of his military command, at the close of that victorious struggle which had placed his country high upon the world's map. There yet stands the chair in which governor Mifflin, (then providing over congress), sat when the commission was resigned, and the short but impressive words uttered, which, of themselves, were enough to give GEORGE WASHINGTON a name to every American heart. On the walls of the chamber hung long-length portraits of Paine, Carroll, Chase and Stone, four of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. In this same building is also the state library, but the short time allotted for our stay did not admit of our visiting it.

We contrived to steal time, however, to climb to the top of the dome, where we were rewarded for a somewhat fatiguing ascent by one of the finest panoramas the eye can ask. The city lies like a map at your feet, with all its old buildings, streets and picturesque vicinity, through which flows the winding Severn, while in the distance lie the bright and silver bay, now exhibiting in full view the object of our journey—the majestic Delaware—lying at anchor off the mouth of the Severn, with her tapering masts and spars distinctly traced against the sky. Here of late hours have been seen to linger, while "admiration feeding at the eye," might expatiate over the attracting view, and examine all its details at leisure. But we hastened down, and, after a transient visit to the City Hotel, descended to the steamboat George Washington, which lay waiting to receive us, while here again the beloved stripes and stars threw their protection over us, the waving lists partially hid by a cloud of steam, whose white column contrasted strongly with volumes of the blackest smoke, and seemed contending with it for the mastery, while the windows of the houses were crowded, and the wharf crowded with spectators, drawn, no doubt, by the expectation of seeing him, the president, on whom all eyes are now bent so so intense and anxious a gaze. We were disappointed in this; they seemed to salute themselves with what was the next best thing, a very curious and critical inspection of the members of his cabinet. At length the bell sounded, and the boat, swinging out from her fastenings, walled us down the bay, some four or five miles, to the spot where the Delaware was moored.

And here we feel sensible our want of nautical knowledge; for though all looked upon that noble object with feelings of the strongest interest and delight, the ignorance of a landsman, mingled with emotion, and a desire to speak and to speak strictly properly of what gave all who gazed upon it such lively pleasure. A ship-of-war any where, and of any nation, is an object fitted to fill the mind and rouse the feelings. It is such a product of human skill—such a triumph of the resources of human strength—it calls up associations of so grave, and yet so exalting, a kind—that it can never be looked upon with entire indifference; but to an American, and in the present circumstances of America, a vessel of her glorious list may—a first-rate American line-of-battle ship—fully and completely equipped for sea, is a spectacle which absorbs the whole man, carrying away his deepest musings to the future and to the past. And, accordingly, it was interesting to witness the truth of this remark, as the steamboat began to approach the great Convention, which had been lively and general, gradually subsided: every eye was fixed. For a time every tongue seemed choked, and one heard only an occasional remark of lowly uttered admiration as her proportions and majestic form became distinctly visible. She lay like a floating palace—no, that is too light and gay a comparison—rather like some formidable fortress, with all its armament set afloat by magic power. Her grim and frowning battlements, now above row, their links and their muzzles protruded from the ports, struck the mind with awe. There was no gilded ornament to relieve the severity of the emotion. Every one must feel that her ornament was out of place. Power—force—was the only thing that she presented. She was the single idea solemnly, almost painfully, impressed upon the soul. And then, as the eye glanced up—upward, upward—along her towering masts, the symmetry, the harmony, the nautical beauty and grace, and the grandeur of sky-line, the majestic union of strength with ease, the desperate science applied to the plainest, (yet the fittest), materials, the gradual diminution and attenuation of the lines of tracery, so beautifully drawn against the sky, occupied the mind, and every one felt that the sight of her seemed the impression produced by the sight of the heavy armament. But how shall we describe the effect, when, suddenly, the spars were seen to be alive with human beings! and the long rows of masts, all dressed in the same simple costume, looked at a first distance as though they were holding hands, and were supported only by the air! Row above row they stood, silently looking down upon the approach of the visitors, (among whom they thought the president was one), with that air of staid and bold carriage which marked the character of the bravest tar. We forgot the guns—we forgot the towering masts. All eyes, and, we believe we may truly add, all hearts were fixed and fastened on the men. There they stood—our gallant and noble crew of American heroes, the defenders—ready to brave the wildest storms; ready to brave the most threatening danger; asking nothing but food, aittance for their mothers, and some just meed of acknowledgment when they have acted nobly in our cause. And who, that is not dead to every grateful feeling can withhold it? Well may the patriotic make delight to embody their praise, and make it the criterion of his interest in our bodies. Poor fellows! how often do those strains sound but the dirge over their deep, their undisturbable grave!

In mounting the ship's side, the secretary of the navy, as might (being first elevated) preceded, and was followed by the residue of the cabinet. Then came the ladies; and then followed a promiscuous crowd of climbing senators, congressmen, judges, governors, generals and naval and military men, of every grade, together with other citizens who had been so fortunate as to have been distinguished by the commodore's gracious invitation. Gracious it was and gracious was its giver, ay, and grateful too, as no man could deny or doubt for a moment who witnessed his reception of his guests, and watched the expression of his dignified and intrepid countenance. He stood near the entrance of his own cabin, surrounded by as fine a group of officers as the eye of a commander or the heart of a contented crew could wish to look upon; and while the commodore of the navy laid their place near him, the commodore of the ship, captain Charles S. McCauley, introduced all her officers in succession according to their rank; to each of whom he extended his hand, with frank and open cordiality which belonged to the man, and which so strongly marks his manners and his character. The youngest midshipman was as kindly and as respectfully received as the oldest lieutenant, and they all seemed to appreciate and to reciprocate the regard with which they were recognized by the respected head of their own deservedly popular department.

The remaining guests having in turn been received, a salute of seventeen guns was fired, being the number prescribed by the daily regulations of the mark of respect to a governor of a state or the head of a department when visiting a ship of war. The marines were paraded on the larboard side of the ship as the guests entered from the opposite side, and in usual creditable appearance; they belong to uniforms critically neat, and their muskets shining with a brilliancy that no labor could have heightened. At the sound of the boatswain's whistle the men descended from the yards, where they had stood till now, looking down upon the spectators beneath their feet. Soon afterwards the drums beat "to quarters," and the men, in their white trousers and turgous hats, (the boatswain of their shirts having a patch of blue cloth upon them worked in white and each with a black ribbon), descended to the several stations, each company around its own gun, and then the proper officers passed round with written rolls in their hands, calling the men by name and according to the station of each man at the piece. The company next waited in a sort of procession, round the vessel, and rested the right side of each number of the company, orderly, hardy looking, able-bodied men as compose the crew was most exhilarating, and we may add, consoling; for it was impossible, while beholding them, thus collected and arranged, not to say to one's self, "my own life and the liberty and honor of my country are entirely safe with such defenders." There were in all nine hundred of them; a portion being, of course, upon the lower decks, so that you could not get the whole into your eye at one ship of their class, and the schooner board the Peninsula at Norfolk. Five bright-eyed boys they are, full of life and ambition, and action and emulation; and the very best of them they will soon prove themselves in the higher and more extended school into which they have now entered.

Having marched round the spar-deck, we were next conducted below. The Delaware is reckoned, in naval estimation, a two-decker; but, like every ship of their class, she has a fore-deck, and the spar-deck, being that to which you step when descending from her bulwarks; the upper or main gun-deck, on which is her lighter battery; the lower gun-deck, on which is her battery of heavy guns; and what is called the orlop-deck, which is appropriated to the use and accommodation of all officers, with the exception of the commodore, captain, first and second lieutenants, whose quarters are above. On the two gun-decks we were gratified in seeing the tables of the crew, arranged opposite the spaces between the guns, with benches, also swung, at each side—the whole capable of being drawn up close to the beams of the deck overhead, to be out of the way when the ship is cleared for action. Here were piled their tin cans, on the top of which it was most gratifying to discover, laid in the nearest order a seaman's little library, consisting of two bibles, two prayer books, two hymn books and one volume of a moral and entertaining character. (The hymn books, in every instance, were the most worn.) We say this was gratifying; for who among men stood more in need of the instructions and the support drawn from the volume of inspiration and the promises of religion than these young souls of the deep-sea lives are in jeopardy beyond the lot of other men, while, too often, their moral and religious education is of all man most neglected?

Speaking of these mess tables, we may as well take this place to observe, that not only here, but every individual thing, whether of wood or metal, on board this fine ship, was as scrupulously and thoroughly clean as the hand of man could make them. The very decks were as white as a milk pail; and the tables so rubbed so cleanly, that they might be eaten from without any intervening substance. It was, soon after, our pleasure to see them surrounded, each with a merry company of cheerful, hungry, contented looking tars, as one need to take a later day's work, to find that the ship was not a mess pork, but from the regions of the cook, (each piece marked by the hy, with the number of the gun), their pans of pea soup, yet hotter than the meat, as we can testify, for we scaled our mouths with a small portion of it at a time. This article of shipboard broken into small pieces, ready for use, altogether looked so inviting and so comfortable, that they might awaken appetite in stomachs cloyed with the delicacies of a more luxurious table, and we very early noticed a number of the men, and among those of the ladies, partaking of this unwanted repast, to the no small surprise and delight of honest Jack, who, having no fork, was somewhat at a loss how to do the greens, but who, after a salt water apology, took his jack knife (well so named, "Jack" is never without it), which hung by a ropeyarn from some part of his dress, and forthwith carved, in a somewhat extemporaneous way, the best morsel in his aid for his unsuspecting guests. On this lower deck fifteen men are stationed, each gun, on the upper, thirteen. It went long to go into a minute account of the many convenient arrangements which were politely shown and explained to us, for availing of the small quantity of extra room, where the ship is so crowded, and giving to the purpose for allowing away in the most compact and convenient manner, the endless variety of matters and things which the service of such a ship requires; bag rooms, bread rooms, spirit rooms, armory, magazines, lockers, stores, carpenter's shop, work room, and more than we can remember, or than there would be time and space to enumerate if we could. All was most orderly. In fact, throughout the entire scene, order seemed to be inscribed every where. There was literally a place for every thing, and every thing was in its place. The officers were most patient with our ignorance, and their politeness suffered not the least expression or look of lurking contempt to betray itself at the many simple and hard laboring questions which we tossed them. All was politeness and good humor. Indeed, there seemed not a human being to be out of humor while we were on board, save one poor fellow, whose cheek was prettily well scorched and (what he called more for, perhaps), his whiskers singed, by the accidental discharge of a pistol from the hand of a shipmate.

We entered, among other partitions, what is called "the sick bay"—a portion of one of the lower decks, raised off for the accommodation of the few sick men, and, in case of an epidemic, for the rest, who were carefully and kindly attended by their messmates, detailed for that duty; and no sick chamber, in any gentleman's house, is in a cleaner or better state. The ship carries out a surgeon and four assistants. The magazines, of which there were two, were of course did not enter.

Among other articles worthy of note, below, were very long and large life-preservers, each capable of sustaining in the water more than fifty men, and the whole was to be landed through the fore of a raft, so that, should the ship founder, the crew would all be rescued from drowning at the time, and, should other circumstances be favorable, might all save their lives. This, we believe, is quite a modern improvement.

The Delaware, though rated as a twenty-four, carries 88 guns; of which, thirty-two are on her lower gun-deck, forty-two pounders; thirty-two on her upper gun-deck, thirty-two pounders; and the fore-deck, which is the deck, she carries the newly invented Paixhan gun, which differs little from others, save that this bore is larger and the gun consequently not so thick, and there is a more exact apparatus for depressing and elevating them; they are fired by percussion caps, and live in a mannerly graduated brass scale by which to regulate the sights. The ball they fire is hollow, in fact a small sized bomb-shell, charged with powder only, and fired point-blank instead of at an angle, as bombs are fired from mortars. A shot which weighs upwards of fifty pounds, and contains a pound of gunpowder; the full charge to propel it is eight pounds, though less than that, and as low as five pounds, is sometimes used.

The dimensions of the ship are as follows:
Extreme length, over all, 205 feet.
Extreme beam 54.6.
Depth of the hold 21.
Length of the keel from post 162.
Cargo net's water line, 4,393.4 tons.
Height from lower edge of rabbit of keel to top of gun-deck 2.48.
Between lower and upper gun-decks 7.10.
Between upper gun-deck and spar-deck 7.6.
Between spar-deck and main-deck 6.104.
Her draught, all, at present is 2.56.

She carries two chain cables, and one of hemp, each of 120 fathoms in length; the former being stopped by a new patent, contrivance with a screw, called, the screw stopper. After the men had refreshed themselves by a good dinner, the drums beat to "general quarters," which signifies that the men are to man all the guns and prepare for action. No sooner was this order given than a cheer was raised, and the men were pulling away, and would be difficult for a landsman to conceive, and which once seen can never be forgotten. The whole crew seemed suddenly to have been seized with one universal madness; they ran about in all directions, as if a lighter hand was attached and bound to each man, from which he was vainly trying to escape. One had his arms and bosom full of pistols; another was carrying hatchets and boarding-pikes; another was running with a load of cutlasses; another had a rammer in his hand; another was pulling a round tow-bag off the sponge which was to sponge out the powder; some were taking off the aprons, or coverings, from the touch-holes; others were clearing out the touch-holes with small wires; others were handling the wadding, or heavy sponges which receive the recoil of the guns, others elevating and pointing the guns; the lights were extinguished; the magazine opened; cartridges were handed up; and more things done in a minute than can well be told in half an hour. The cheering, the hurrahs, the shouting, the officers delivering orders through their speaking trumpets; midshipmen passing about every where; not a voice heard but the voice of command; till, at length, after all these multiplied and seemingly confused movements, the order was given, "fire!" "fire!" was given; and then the mock engagement began in earnest. The heavy guns were discharged irregularly, at in very rapid succession, sometimes several at once, jarring the ship from stem to stern; the unwarlike, the useless commenced discharges of musketry on the spar-deck, in which they were accompanied by the sailors, each of whom had a short gun and a pistol, both of which they reloaded, firing away with all their might.

The effect of these merrimentous was truly astounding to look upon, and in the midst of it an officer went to the gangway with a large wooden rattler, which he plied vigorously for some moments, when, presently up came the men, in troops, treading on one another's heels in their haste, with boarding-pikes, axes, and broad short swords, with which they climbed the bulwarks as if expecting to meet an enemy endeavoring to scale their marine ramps and to take the ship by boarding. Those with the pikes and short swords went over the hammocks, as if to get a better footing; while those with the swords rushed to the top and there stood upon the hammocks, (which are closely stowed above the bulwarks), brandishing their bright broad blades, looking over as if to see their foes climbing the bulwarks from without. Surprised they all rushed in a crowd towards the bowsprit, sometimes to one side of the ship, sometimes to the other, as the orders of the officers resounded in the confusion; meanwhile, the thirty-two pounders were thundering away, and, as they continued, the men, who were their imaginary adversaries until, having sunk and destroyed them all, they were ordered to desert, and the drums beat a triumphant sound as if in celebration of the victory.

During this scene—a scene which no words can adequately describe—the visitors stood in astonishment, some having climbed up on the boats between the masts, others being mounted on the round house, and among them, to the astonishment of many, and to the disgust of others, a few were allowed to quail or faint, but seeming rather startled and excited by the sights and sounds around them, although the atmosphere was filled with smoke, and it was impossible to hear your own speak, and the deck trembled beneath their feet.

We had often heard and read of engagements at sea, but never did an adequate conception enter our mind of what must be the trial and contrivance, the errors and excitement of such a spectacle. It seemed pretty formidable even here, where there were none of those fearful adjuncts which there enhance the horrors of the scene. Here we were not the enemy, driving in the bulwarks and sending murderous projectiles in every direction, no falling of masts and spars; no gory wounds, and decks adrift with blood. Yet, from the excitement which was every where manifested in this short mock fight, as well by officers as men, by raw recruits, and even by frail and delicate women, we might be well imagined that where the fearful game is actually playing in earnest, every thing like fear vanishes in a moment, and all the real horrors of the scene are lost and overwhelmed in the absorbing anxiety for victory.

The battle over, we were called in an attack of a different kind. Both in the captain's cabin and in the ward-room tables were spread with a substantial cold collation of beef, lamb, tongues, fowls, &c. flanked by a plentiful supply of the juice of the grape; and with what the fatigues of the journey and with the terrors of the engagement, every body seemed in trim to do the amplest justice to the hospitality of the host. Kuvers and forks rattled almost as loudly as the broadsword and cut-throat had done a little before; and in a very short time the tables, if not the decks, were strewn with "dead men." No speeches were made, (unless very short ones, between chicken and champagne), but to witness the close of the entertainment the health of captain Mc-Cauley and the officers of the Delaware, was given by col. Washington, and drank with a unanimous and very brave expression of assent. Presently the toast was amended by including the crew, when an enthusiastic soldier cried out, "yes, by Jove, and the ship too!" The commander of the Delaware returned the compliment by toasting the members of congress, with a wish that "they might make liberal appropriations for the navy."—This ally produced a little piquant remark; which was yet further brightened by a rejoinder from Mr. Dean, expressing his confidence that "whenever the officers and crew of that ship met an enemy, they might do the same for them." The company then retired to the deck, to see the admirable band attached to the ship perform some of Boston's most admired airs in a style with which the composer himself would not have been dissatisfied. After this we had one more treat, in witnessing a number of our warlike gunnemen in raising and lowering the wide and heavy sails of the ship.

The closing hour was spent in general hilarity and enjoyment. Never, we believe, were more delighted faces collected in one glad group, within the same space, before. The company were delighted; the officers were delighted; the men seemed as well pleased as either; the ship rang with explosions of laughter and salutes of wit; and when the parting salute came, and the yards were again manned, there was not an individual who saw the smoke of the last gun curling and rolling majestically over the water, and heard the rich sound of the huzzas from yards and decks, who did not bring away with him a warmer heart toward our gallant navy, and the brave, well-armed and gallantly officers who will bear its flag untarnished over every sea and who, whenever he remembers or hears of the Delaware, will not associate with that name the remembrance of at least one happy day.

THE ARMY.

From Florida. The troops made by the colonel commanding to give Wild Cat a ride on Harnett's rail road, had had the desired effect, and I am happy to inform you that 65 of his people are now at Tampa, making the whole number of houses now in it. It is the intention of col. Worth to send them, her safe keeping to the other side of the river. The red infantry take the field to-morrow in pursuit of Alcock Tuwestenngens. It is to be hoped that their persevering efforts may be crowned with success. The gentleman keeps shy since his sound thrashing by Genl. Alberts.

The troops at Fort King, Florida, continue very sickly, as well as those at other posts.

(Savannah Georgian, Aug. 10.)

The 2d regiment. The Buffalo Commercial says: The 2d artillery under the command of col. Banks, left this city, via the Erie canal, the seaboard, yesterday morning. The boats, fifteen in number, belonging to the Detroit and Troy and Erie lines, Messrs. Kingman & Co. and Col. Kimberly & Co. agents, had the contract.

The Detroit detachment are comfortably situated in the 2d's late quarters, at Poinsett barracks.

THE NAVY.

The U. S. schooner Grampus, Lieut. Paine, commanding, arrived at Boston on Saturday morning, from the Cape of Africa, via Ponce, P. R.

The frigate "Congress" was launched at Portsmouth navy yard on the 16th inst. She is said to be a splendid specimen of naval architecture. Great pains have been taken with her construction, and experienced artificers have expressed great admiration of her model and proportions. This ship, in fact, says the Boston Courier, designed to be a model frigate—and we have reason to believe that no little interest is felt by the navy board, and naval architects, to know what may be the result of some experiments tried in her construction.

The Norfolk Beacon says, that the French frigate L'Armida, of 46 guns, captain Loutat, bearing the broad pennant of admiral Arnoux, and brig L'Aurore, of 16 guns, captain Guenier, came up from Hampton roads on Sunday morning, and anchored off the naval hospital. The customary salutes were exchanged by those ships and the Pennsylvania, flagship of com. Shubrick.

The brig Hissin, of 20 guns, captain D'Auignille, is daily expected.

It is stated in the Philadelphia papers that orders have been given to prepare the frigate Haritan, which had been so long on the stocks at the navy yard Philadelphia, to be employed as one of the blockading squadrons.

The United States ship St. Louis, commander Forrest, sailed from Tahiti, March 7, for the Sandwich Islands. The officers and crew were well, except Lieut. Darlington, who was convalescent.

London Standard. The Boston Herald-American Journal publishes a letter from an officer attached to the East India squadron, dated Cape of Good Hope, April 22d. The squadron was about sailing from Saldanha bay, for the purpose of overhauling the Constellation's rigging.

Cape of Good Hope papers to the 11th of May, received at New York, mention that the U. S. ship Constellation and Boston were still at Saldanha bay.

The longest way round. The hon. Mark Kerr, a lieutenant in the British navy, says the Boston Mercantile Journal, arrived in the Sarah Parker, from Singapore, last week, and took passage in the Acadia, for Liverpool. He wishes to be in England as soon as possible on leaving Cape Horn, and though some English ships were about to sail to London direct, he preferred taking passage for Boston, as his quickest route. He will probably be in England 140 days after leaving Singapore.

GOV. MCNUTT'S LETTER.

We publish below, the correspondence between governor McNutt and the bond holders in Amsterdam, Messrs. Hoyle & Co. It will read with interest.

To the governor of the state of Mississippi:

The undersigned, as trustees for the holders of debentures of the Bank of the United States at Philadelphia, on deposit of American state stocks, and amongst others, of a considerable amount of bonds of the state of Mississippi, bearing five per cent. interest, issued through the Union Bank at Mississippi, and made payable to the agency of the United States bank of Pennsylvania, in London, the principal in 1850 and 1855, and the dividends semi-annual in May and November, having been refused payment of the interest due on the 1st of the month, on said bonds, are compelled to address themselves to the government of the state of Mississippi; and from their confidence in the faith of that government, they feel convinced, that the simple mention of the fact of the non-payment of such a debt stimulus for the government of the state of Mississippi to take immediate measures for the payment of the interest now due and which will further successively become due on those bonds, and to prevent the circulation of the currency, and to the interest of American credit in general, and to that of the state of Mississippi in particular.

HOPE & CO.

Amsterdam, 22d May, 1841.

Executive department, city of Jackson, July 18, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter, dated Amsterdam, 22d May, 1841, postmarked Washington city, June 21st, 1841, and bearing the official frank of the honorable Daniel Webster, secretary of state of the United States. I have duly considered the contents thereof. Those bonds were issued by the state of Mississippi, in conformity with the laws of that state—they were delivered by me as removed, to be sold at not less than their par value, and for cash, as the statute of this state required. The charter of the Mississippi Union bank prescribes not only the substance, but the form of the bonds; and provides that they shall be in the sum of two thousand dollars each—“which sum, the said state of Mississippi promises to pay in current money of the United States,” to the order of the bank, with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, payable half yearly at the place named in the endorsement of the bonds. The act further provides, that “said bonds shall not be sold under their par value.” The bonds have been delivered to the managers of the bank to be sold on certain conditions, the state cannot be bound for their redemption, unless the terms prescribed were complied with in the sale. The constitution of this state expressly provides, that “no law shall ever be passed to raise a loan of money upon the credit of the state, or to pledge the faith of the state for the payment or redemption of any loan or debt, unless such law be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and be agreed to by a majority of the members of each house and entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and be referred to the next succeeding legislature and published for three months previous to the next regular election, in three naves per cent. of this state, and unless a majority of each branch of the legislature so elected after such publication, shall agree to and pass such law; and in such case, the yeas and nays shall be taken and entered on the journals of each house of the state of Mississippi, and this section shall be so construed as to prevent the legislature from negotiating a further loan of one and a half millions of dollars, and vesting the same in stock reserved to the state by the charter of the Planters' Bank of the state of Mississippi.”

Five millions of state bonds, dated the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th days of June, 1838, were sold by the commissioners appointed by the Mississippi Union bank, to N. Bidde, esq. on the 15th day of Aug., 1838, at five millions of dollars, and the sum of one million dollars each, on the first day of November, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, and on the first days of January, March, May, and July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, and made payable at the agency of the bank of the U. S. at London, in sterling money of Great Britain, at the rate of four shillings and sixpence to the dollar, with interest payable semi-annually, at the same place and rate. No authority is ever given by an act of congress, or by the constitution, to change the currency in which said bonds were made payable. By selling the bonds on a credit, and changing them from dollars, current money of the United States, to pounds sterling of Great Britain, the following suits were

Interest on five millions state bonds, from 7th June, 1839, to 1st November 1838.	$190,000 00
Interest on four millions 2 months	$3,353 38
Interest on three millions 2 months	24,999 90
Interest on two millions 2 months	16,666 64
Interest on one million 2 months	8,333 32
	$184,353 90
Difference between five millions dollars, principal of state bonds, in current money of the United States and sterling money of Great Britain, at four shillings and sixpence to the dollar.	478,730 00
Difference of interest on $123,000 of state bonds, payable in twelve years, between current money of the United States and pounds sterling of Great Britain, at four shillings and sixpence to the dollar.	59,625 00
Difference of interest on $3,750,000 of state bonds, payable in twenty years, between current money of the United States and pounds sterling of Great Britain, at four shillings and sixpence to the dollar.	353,028 00
	$1,084,781 50

From the above statement, it will be perceived that one hundred and eighty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-eight dollars and thirty cents, were lost by selling the five millions dollars of bonds on a credit and paying interest thereon from their respective dates; and the further sum of nine hundred and one thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars, were lost by changing the bonds from dollars, current money of the United States, to pounds sterling of Great Britain. These two sums amount to the enormous sum of one million eight hundred and seven hundred and eighty-one dollars and thirty cents. Surely, such a sale cannot be binding on the state of Mississippi. The faith of this state was pledged for the payment of those bonds for carrying into execution any of the powers granted by the constitution, to establish an office or offices in any of the states whatever, and the establishment thereof shall be directed by law, it shall be the duty of the said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

It will be seen that by this clause the directors are invested with the fullest power to establish a branch in any State which has yielded its assent;—and having once established such branch, it shall not afterwards be withdrawn, except by order of congress. The assent of the State is given by the force and sanction of an actually expressed assent, “provided in respect to any state which shall not at the first session of the legislature thereof, held after the passage of this act, by resolution or otherwise, expressly protest against such assent, or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent: of said state shall be thereafter presumed.” The assent or dissent to be expressed unconditionally at the first session of the legislature by some formal legislative act; and if no such act be passed, the assent or dissent of the directors are thereupon invested with power, at such time thereafter as they may please, to establish branches which cannot afterwards be withdrawn, except by resolution of congress. No matter what may be the grounds of protest, or of dissent by the legislature, which either prevents, or induces delay, addresses itself to their wisdom, to induce delay, its assent is to be implied. This iron rule is to give way to no circumstances—it is unbending and inflexible. It is the language of the master to the slave, and the slave is to obey. It is the language of the victor to the vanquished, and delay, postponement, or inequality to answer, produces an implied assent which is ever after irrevocable. Many of the state elections have already taken place, without any knowledge, on the part of the directors, of the result; the question was to come up. The representatives are to be sworn to the omission of the question to their constituents preparatory to final action upon it, but this high privilege is denied; whatever may be the motives and views entertained by the representatives of the people to the contrary, they are to be bound to assent, and never afterwards binding, unless their dissent shall be unconditionally expressed at their first session after the passage of this bill into a law. They may, by formal resolution, declare the question of assent or dissent to be not now and postponed; and yet, in opposition to their express declaration, and against their assent is to be implied. Cases unnumberable might be cited to manifest the irrationality of such an inference. Let one or two in addition suffice. The popular branch of the legislature may express its dissent, and yet the assent of the senate resolution may be defeated by a tie vote of the senate, and yet the assent is to be implied. Both branches of the legislature may concur in a resolution of decided dissent, and yet the governor may concur in the same, and yet the assent by the state constitution, and their legislative action be implied; and yet the assent of the legislative authority is implied, and the directors of this contemplated institution are authorized to establish a branch or branches in such state whenever they may find it to be in the best interest of the cause of the slave; and having once established it, they can under no circumstances withdraw it, except by act of congress. The state may afterwards protest against such unjust inference, but its authority is gone. It is no longer a State, it is a mere territory to act at its first session, and its voice can no longer be heard. To inferences so violent, and, as they seem to me, irrational, I cannot yield my consent. No court of justice would or could sanction them, without reserving all that is established in judicial proceedings, and all that is established in fact, with fact, and inferences at the expense of reason. A state in a condition of duress would be presumed to speak, as an individual, manacled and in prison, might be presumed to be in a condition of freedom. A man in a condition of duress would be presumed to consent, as an individual, manacled and in prison, might be presumed to be in a condition of freedom. A man in a condition of duress would be presumed to consent, as an individual, manacled and in prison, might be presumed to be in a condition of freedom. A man in a condition of duress would be presumed to consent, as an individual, manacled and in prison, might be presumed to be in a condition of freedom.

may be said that the directors have no established authority to make such a determination. But this is a question of power, and this bill invests them with full authority to do so. If the legislature of New York or Massachusetts, or any other state, should be asked to pass a law in such a case, it would be difficult to see how any security furnished against such a step on the part of the directors? Nay, it is not fairly to be presumed that this proviso was introduced for the sole purpose of meeting the contention that the directors had no authority to do so. It was introduced? And I submit to the senate, whether it can be believed that any state would be likely to resist quietly down under such a state of things? It is a great measure of public interest their patriotism and their conscientiousness would not permit them to pass from circumstances at war with such inferonce, I cannot but regard as calculated to excite a feeling of fatal enmity with the peace and harmony of the country. I must, therefore, regard this clause as asserting the power to be in congress to establish offices of discount in a state, not only without its assent, but against its dissent; and so it is, in fact, an assumption of the right of the principles, the right in congress to prescribe terms to any state, implies a superiority of power and control, deprives the transaction of all pretence to compact between them, and terminates, as we have seen, in the total abrogation of freedom of action on the part of the state. I therefore further express, after the most solemn form of legislation, the dissent, which may from time to time hereafter be repeated, in full view of its own interest, which can never be separated from the wise and beneficent operation of this government; and yet congress may, in the exercise of its power, and upon grounds which, to such state, will appear to rest on a constructive necessity and propriety and nothing more. I regard the bill as asserting for congress the right to incorporate a United States bank with power and right to establish offices of discount in any state, whether with or without the assent of the state, with or without their consent; a principle to which I have always heretofore been opposed, and which can never obtain my sanction. And waving all other considerations growing out of its other provisions, I return it to the house in which it originated,

JOHN TYLER

Washington, August 16, 1841.

THE VETO MESSAGE

The following extracts will furnish specimens of the language of the public press, upon the president's veto message.

From the Madisonian, August 17.

The veto message. This day is the beginning of a new year in the publication of this paper, and it is also an epoch in the history of this republic.—Precisely four years ago, we entered this political metropolis of the union, and vowed upon the altar of patriotism that our energies should be devoted to the resistance of the sub-treasury and to the restoration of the currency to a sound and stable and popular basis. The system we opposed has been tried and condemned by the people and by congress, and the act repealing it, on Saturday last, received the sanction of the president. Having thus far fulfilled our pledges, we, this morning of our entering upon a fifth volume, take a fresh, though not a new, departure, and dedicate our organ to a document, which, we trust to be the introduction to a new and better order of things.

No deducting reader of this paper will be surprised to see in its columns to-day, A VETO, by president TYLER, of the bill to incorporate a national bank. No one, who knows his character or the history of his opinions, could possibly have anticipated a different result as the result of his deliberate action. The bill was not a measure which he knows that there is no will to show one recorded line of ours in favor of such an institution, can be surprised by the readiness, we avow, to sustain to the extent of our ability, the act of the president.—We have the less hesitation in doing so, for the reason of our profound conviction from the beginning that the bill was a measure which would not pass, and for the fact of our sincere belief, as it is our earnest desire, that a great and glorious good may ultimately come out of it in the attainment by some other mode, of the ends of the government and the wants of the people, and the final adjustment of this vexed question upon a perfectly constitutional basis, that will be likely to avoid those broilers, before the fluctuations of trade and the arrival of a party.

It has doubtless been to the president's painful duty to differ with many of his friends, and especially so to the extent of feeling constrained to put his negative upon an important, and, with many, a long and deeply cherished act, of those who contributed to the progress of the country. It is gratifying to find in the record to the fact that an act of Providence and the choice of the people placed Mr. TYLER at the head of the government, with all his long cherished, matured and well known principles and opinions still upon his conscience, they will find in their hearts no honest disposition to censure, however they may differ with him. If the president is in no reasonable sacrifice, we are sure, he would not have made, to meet all the just expectations of his friends, compatible with his duty to his country and the constitution. He has rededicated upon the subject with the deepest anxiety, and with the most sincere desire to settle a question which has so long and so deeply divided the people. He has been guided by the wisdom of courtesy, he yet has been unable to bring his mind to a concurrence with the principles of the measure they presented for his signature. He has diligently discharged his duty, according to his oath and his conscience, and the bill is returned with his objections, frankly, clearly and firmly stated. It remains for congress and the country to pass judgment upon the act, and we devoutly hope they may bring to its consideration a heart and mind, as candid, as kind, as dispassionate and as conscientious, as has been exercised by him.

The president's objections are confined principally to three points, viz:

1. The unconstitutionality of the bill;
2. The impracticability of the 16th fundamental article of the 11th section;
3. The absence of all necessity of a federal bank to make local loans, as a means of transacting the fiscal business of the government.

The first point he deems it unnecessary to argue. It is a matter of faith and of profound conviction, long entertained, and every where proclaimed by him in every form of expression.

The second point he argues very forcibly, and makes it sufficiently apparent that the so-called "compromised" section is an evasion, not a concession, and that while it at first appears to yield a point, subsequently fully asserts its power to establish branches without the unqualified assent of the states, the lawful existence of which he denies. He also intimates that it would bring the states and the federal government into direct conflict, putting the peace of the union to peril. He shows that it is otherwise impracticable, and at war with reason and justice.

Another point, relating to the discounting power, is especially worthy the attention of statesmen and of the people. There is no man better acquainted with the corrupting tendency of local loans from a federal corporation than Mr. TYLER, as his report of 1854 will clearly show. It is in this cause more especially, than any other, that the corruptions and the abuses of the banking system of the country had been attributable. The enormous discounts of the late bank to favorite preceptors, politicians and legislators, and their evil effects, are not forgotten, and the fate of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States perpetuated the example to the last. These evils are not necessary, and ought, if possible, to be avoided. The discounting of the currency is not necessary for the regulation of commerce or the currency.—The only possible pretext for it is, that it is a source of profit, when judiciously used, to the bank. But it is frequently the cause of its bankruptcy. Government need not be necessarily subject to the injurious and fluctuating effects of such a cause. It wants, and it must want, more than any thing else, a STABLE SYSTEM.

A federal institution, established with reference to the finances, can properly have but three objects:

1. To facilitate the collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenues.

3. Incidentally to facilitate commerce, by cheapening and equalizing the exchanges of the country.

It, therefore, the deliberations of the future shall lead to the establishment of an institution free from constitutional objections, and upon principles which shall fulfil the wants of the government and the people, and be at the same time stable and enduring, the problem will be solved, and the country will be at rest.

From the National Intelligencer of same date.

The veto. The suspense in which both city and country has been kept for some days as to the fate of the bank bill, which passed both houses of congress more than a week ago, is at last ended. The president yesterday returned it to the senate, in which branch it originated, with his objections. A copy of the message containing them will be found in the preceding column.

We regret exceedingly that such should have been the fate of the bank bill: not that we had any partiality for its particular form or structure, or had much confidence in its winning the necessary confidence of capitalists. But we approved the principle of the bill, and calculated upon amendments being made to it by a supplementary act which would have obviated the principal objections to it.

We confess ourselves also to be disappointed by this result. We had supposed the measure of a national bank to be as clearly indicated, by the popular enfranchisement in November last, as the repeal of the sub-treasury, or any other whig principle supposed to be sanctioned by that vote.

We knew, it is true, that the president had, in times past, in both branches of congress, by his speeches and votes, declared his personal conviction of the unconstitutionality of a national bank. But we flattered ourselves that he would draw the dis-tion, which we thought we perceived, between the legislative and the executive character, which would allow of his signing an act in the one capacity which he would vote against in the other. Our impression, in this particular, was strengthened by a passage in his address to the people of the United States, which construed into an intimation that he would follow the example of Mr. Madison, and consider the power to establish a bank as settled by adjudication and acquiescence.

We therefore felt justified in predicting to our readers, with some confidence, that we should have a bank. For the moment, at least, that prediction has signally failed of accomplishment. The president has refused to sign the law for reasons which we feel bound to respect. The freedom of conscience is with us too sacred to be profaned; and we cannot deny to the president the privilege which we shall always claim for ourselves.

What is now to be done? is the question which naturally presents itself.

We are not of the temper of those who, after experiencing a disappointment in one thing, would fold our arms and attempt nothing more. "The plough goes on after a barren year; and, while the sheaves are yet warm, we take a new lesson upon the ruins of a former." Such is the course which, if our counsels could weigh with our friends in congress, would now prevail. There are among them, we know, proud hearts and exulting spirits, who might on the impulse of the moment, decide upon a different course. Of such, we would ask, what good can be expected from vehemence and outbreak? So far from effecting any good, such a course would weaken, disunite, and finally pervert the power of the whig party. Let us with the best hopes of the country. Shall such a catastrophe as this be allowed to follow the veto? Would such be the suitable remedy for the pain of the moment?

The bank, or fiscal agent, is a question of great interest; it is true; but there are questions of greater importance than that depending in congress, which the people confidently expect the whigs to carry out, and to which there is no doubt of the cordial co-operation of the president. He is not less convinced, we feel assured, that the whigs in congress, that nothing else can restore the prosperity of the country. We may gather, indeed, from the veto message itself, that the president is now ready to sanction a bank, such as, though short of what we should prefer, shall adapt itself to essential wants of the country.

We trust, therefore, that calmness, consideration and patriotism will be the prevailing spirit of the occasion, and that congress will not only carry out all its other great measures, but will also make a further trial for a bank, at this session. Possibly that object may not be accomplished till the next session, but it seems to us to be worth a trial. The course of representatives has shown how much important work may be done by the whigs, when men are both resolved and firm. Where there is a will there is a way. There is nothing so difficult, (not being impossible), that stout hearts and willing hands cannot accomplish it.

Let union and concordance, then, animate the whig party. Above all, let not the miscarriage of a single measure defeat the high raised hopes of the country in regard to others.

From the Washington Globe, August 16.
The veto. The public mind has been led to a national bank will be relieved by the president's message delivered to the senate to-day, and now presented in our columns. We think that it decides the question of a bank in any form for the present presidential term, and that the whig party, if constitution may celebrate this veto as they did that of general Jackson, as a great deliverance from that fatal system of corruption which, in the course of time, could not fail to make dollars, and not votes, sovereign to the country.

The message, it will be seen, confines the functions of any fiscal agent which may be established, to the legitimate purposes for which alone congress has a right to provide in connection with the treasury—for the collecting, safe-keeping and disbursing the public revenue. The president speaks a volume in this—I will say that in looking to the powers of the government to collect, safely keep and disburse the public revenue, and incidentally to regulate commerce and exchanges, we have been able to satisfy myself that the establishment by this government of a bank of discount in the ordinary acceptance of that term, was a necessary means, or one demanded by propriety to execute these powers. We understand that the regulation of commerce and exchanges, by the operations of the treasury, as meaning only that which necessarily follows the action of the government in performing the indispensable duty of the treasury department in relation to the revenue, which ought, in every way, to be accommodated to all the public interests in every point on which it touches them. The message evidently would confine the faculties of the fiscal agent of the government to the direct objects of the department of the government of which it formed a part, and would not confer on it any additional substantive power to regulate commerce and exchanges, but would make the government agency, employed in its own specific duty, operate as advantageously as possible on some interest of the community not intimately allied with it, viz: the commerce and exchanges of the union.

In this the president directly reverses the federal scheme. A national bank of discount has for its principal object the creation and safe keeping of a national currency, by which it would supersede the currency of the constitution. And instead of making the collecting, safe-keeping and disbursing the public revenue the main scope of its action, the raising of revenue for its stockholders out of the public revenues as well as its own capital, would, (apart from politics), be its great function. The collecting, safe-keeping and disbursing of public money would be a mere incident, or rather a mere means out of which it would operate and disburse its principal object to the public. In a word, in making a national bank to do the simple business of counting in and counting out the public money, and then surrendering to it the power of taxation, the faculty of lending, and the privilege of discounting, the president would have nation in effect surrender its sovereignty to have a very trivial function performed for it—and that taken out of the hands of an ordinary individual agent, every where found in all ages and all countries perfectly competent to it. Federalism failed, we saw that extravagance in this, as in other things—it kills an ox or makes suicide for a pig.

There is another great point gained in the scope to which president Tyler limits any fiscal agency which may be established by congress, in the execution of legitimate government functions. He destroys the possibility of perpetuating any system which may be adopted by congress under the pretext of "vested rights." When an agency is employed merely to collect, keep and disburse the public money, it cannot be pretended that congress cannot change, modify or repeal at pleasure such fiscal machine, as circumstances may vary, and experience prove to be necessary. We shall hear no more of the sacredness of the government, or of the government, being contracted away to a corporation, and bound to submit to the abuses of such "chartered libertine," for twenty, or thirty, or fifty years, as those in power for the time being may choose to better it, for the one or the other of these terms.

Besides the political blessing, this veto brings with it a moral, which we hope is pregnant with blessings for the future. It punishes those the most atrocious fraud ever attempted upon a nation. Gen. Tyler, who has been so long and so loudly the didates of the bank party, because they were the solemnly pledged opponents of a national bank on constitutional grounds. They were known to be so to the whole federal party, and were so presented, for the votes of those opposed the establishment of a bank, and when they had attained power in part by the suffrages of those opposed to a bank, it is made manifest by Mr. Clay's bill, that the whole representative body of federalism in congress, had been guilty of a conspiracy to bring to the chief magistrate to violate his conscience, his pledges—his oath—to establish an institution, against which he was committed from his first appearance in public life, to his last as a candidate for the second office of the government. The whig party have labored, might and main, to make the man who has been labored to confer the highest dignity, stand forth before the people and all future generations, not as other men who have attained its first honor of the republic—not as a president—but as an impostor.

The federal representatives in congress, and their leader, (Mr. Clay), have nothing to plead in retaliation of the shocking sacrifice they would make of Mr. Tyler as a man and a public functionary, or to cover the depraved motives which prompted to pursue such purpose. They not only knew what Mr. Tyler's opinions were before he was elected, but since. In his first message, he not only intimated his own, but proclaimed that the opinions of the people had been again and again declared against a bank—and yet they have pressed upon him and demanded his consent to the establishment of a national bank in the most odious and objectionable form ever fashioned in this or any other country. They have acknowledged the error of their course, for this act of deliverance. If he maintains his position firmly, he will ever be acknowledged a public benefactor. We care not what he has for a fiscal agent, or whether he has any fiscal agent; so that, if whenever management is instituted, it is conferred in his powers simply to the business of the treasury; and no pretext given to place it beyond the reach of the people, under the abused principle of vested rights or contracts. We hold that the rights of the people and the government cannot be contracted away—but for the peace of the country we rejoice that the president excludes, as we understand his veto, the possibility of its application, as formerly, to any system of management of the finances which may be suitably, by extension, to all the public connection or partnership with the public agency, and holding it strictly and simply to the discharge of a public trust.

From the Baltimore Republican of Aug. 17.

VIVE LE REPUBLICAIN! Never has taken pen in hand with more sincere pleasure and delight than now, when we are enabled to announce to our readers the truly gratifying intelligence that the president of the United States, rising above the influence of party feeling, has done his duty to his long-cherished principles and his country, and placed his VETO UPON THE MONEY MONSTER, which had been conceived and brought forth in corruption. This act of president Tyler entitles him to the warmest thanks of every well-wisher of his country, and will place his name among the bright galaxy of patriots to live in grateful remembrance, when the names of those who would have used him for their sinister purposes, will be only referred to as the names of traitors. We give him credit for this manly act; and hope, now that he has struck the blow which is to sever him from the corruptionists, that he will follow it up until the other obnoxious schemes of whiggery are, with this president, forever buried in the past. We shall never again to raise their hideous heads to our happy country. This first blow has been a powerful one; let him not falter or fall back, but be firm and determined, and all will be well for the country, and the people.

President Tyler could not have done otherwise than place his veto upon the bill, without having justified his whole political life, and stood before the world a monument of political inconsistency and bad public character. He has shown himself in the first, and has thereby saved the latter, and we freely accord to him the merit which is justly his due.

From the Baltimore American of Aug. 18.

THE VETO MESSAGE. Our readers have read this document before, and we give this morning the views of the several journals at the seat of government. We cannot pretend to disguise the feelings of regret and disappointment with which this exercise of his constitutional duty, the president of the United States has seen fit to stand out against the expressed voice of the two houses of congress, thereby producing an unpleasant disagreement between the executive and legislative branches of the government. We would use no words of reproach, nor cast any imputation upon motives. The president has exercised nothing more than a constitutional right; and he has done this, no doubt, under the imperative sense of conscientious obligations. It is the difficulty that we regret—the difficulty produced by the variant constructions of the constitution on the part of congress and the executive.

In this state of things the question arises—What course will be pursued by congress now for the indulgence of an exaggerated feeling, and violent denunciations that can do no good. Disappointment, deep and heartfelt, is experienced by the whig party, at large, and at the first blush the impulse of indignation is to give way to warm expressions indicating a sense of gross wrong, and a sense of trust betrayed, and of privilege abused. But there is, we trust, a strong principle of patriotism in the American people, which will come to the aid of civil reflection, in the present case, inducing charity of feeling in the exercise of judgment. Let us take realities as they are and deal with facts to the best advantage that circumstances will admit of.—There is between congress and the executive a difference of opinion on one subject. But there are other subjects upon which the government can act in harmony. At all events, let it be presumed so until the contrary is shown.

We are free to confess that we can discover, in the veto message, no ground broad and substantial enough to afford a basis for a national bank. And if a willingness for conciliation shall appear at the seat of government, laid no violent action on either part be permitted to widen the difference. If no agreement can be had—what then? Why let the question be acknowledged by the president, and let an opportunity to declare their will again. If the necessity for a national bank is not apparent now, we believe that the experience of two years more will add arguments enough to remove the objections

On this ground of inequality, he should not vote for the bill, without the amendments were adopted.

The debate was then further continued between Messrs. Sevier, Walker, Clay, Buchanan and Sturgeon; when the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Buchanan, Calhoun, Caldwell, Richardson, Fane, Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Harrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Indiana, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Linn, McKelister, Mangum, Merrill, Miller, Morehead, Norton, Forster, Prentiss, Rice, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Young—38.

Another amendment, offered by Mr. Sturgeon, not distinctly heard, was lost without a division.

Mr. Archer moved to amend the bill by striking from the 8th section that clause which renders the disposition of the funds obligatory for roads, bridges, canals, &c. which, when made, were to be made free for the use of the United States in transporting the mail, munitions of war, &c.

The proposition led to a long debate, in which Messrs. White, Smith, of Indiana, Clay, Huntington, Benton and Sevier participated.

On motion of Mr. Mangum, the senate adjourned.

August 13. Mr. Calhoun presented the proceedings of a meeting held in Petersburg, and that in Virginia, in relation to the proceedings of the extra session, denouncing the bank as unconstitutional, and contending for the power of repeal. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on the public lands, reported the bill from the house for extending the time of locating military bounty land warrants, without amendment.

Mr. Merrick, from the committee on the District of Columbia, reported the bill from the house relating to the amendment of the charter of Georgetown.

The joint resolution offered by Mr. Huntington, for the transfer of the light-house at Sandy Hook, to the United States, in Long Island, and that at Parliett's Reef to Executive Rocks, was read a third time and passed.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, being the bill for the extension of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands; the amendment of Mr. Archer pending, viz: to strike out from the 8th section the clause making it obligatory to apply the proceeds to purposes of internal improvement.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. offered some observations against the amendment.

When the question was taken, and decided in the negative.

Mr. McKeberts then moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision granting to the states of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama a quantity of land, which, together with that already received, exclusive of the 16th section for school purposes, should be equal to that granted to Ohio.

Mr. McR. spoke in favor of this amendment until he was quite exhausted and had to sit down.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, remarked somewhat at large in reply to Mr. McKeberts.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama was satisfied that the amendment should have been resisted any where; least of all did he expect resistance to come from a senator from a new state. Mr. C. had never complained that Ohio had received too much, but that the new states had received too little, and the object of the amendment was to place all on a proper footing of equality.

Mr. Calhoun would vote for the amendment. If the bill was to pass, it would be right and proper. If it were presented as an alternative, to give the lands to the new states or distribute the proceeds among the states, he would yield up every acre to the new states, and think he did right.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Young, Clay, of Alabama, Walker, Smith, of Indiana, and others, when a modification of the amendment was suggested by Mr. Benton, to the effect that "no grant be made to each of such states as may hereafter become members of the federal union; which was adopted."

Messrs. Benton, Porter and Woodbridge severally addressed the senate at some length, when the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. McKeberts, as modified, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Kerr, Linn, McKelister, Moulton, Porter, Rice, Sevier, Simmons, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, White, Woodbridge—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Caldwell, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Man-gum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Prentiss, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Wright—25.

Mr. Walker moved to add an additional section, providing that the public lands now remaining unsold in Tennessee are hereby ceded to said state; and when each of the other states shall have been as long in the union as Tennessee has been, the public lands remaining unsold in their borders shall be ceded to them, from time to time, respectively; provided that this shall only operate as a relinquishment of such property on the part of the United States, reserving all sites of forts, armaments, &c. that have been selected by congress.

This was debated by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Kerr, King, White and Archer, which latter gentleman suggested a modification, which was accepted, to insert a provision that the lands of Tennessee should be subject to the claims of South Carolina and Georgia against them.

The amendment was then rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, McKelister, Moulton, Nicholson, Sevier, Simmons, Walker, Woodbridge—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrill, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Rice, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Williams—25.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, offered an amendment, to strike from the 10th section, the provision excluding all from pre-emption rights under this act, who may heretofore have had the benefit of pre-emption under any other act.

After brief remarks by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Smith, of Indiana, and Benton, this was adopted—yeas 22, nays 20.

Mr. Sevier moved that when the senate adjourns, they adjourn to Monday next.

Mr. Berrien hoped the motion would not prevail. They had long been here, and hoped soon to bring the session to a close. And independently of the ordinary duties of legislation, the senate had much peculiar business before it, which it could not consistently postpone till next session. The house were many days in advance of them.

Mr. Sevier had moved the adjournment with a view to visiting the ship Delaware, at Annapolis; for which the other house had adjourned to Monday. They would not, however, vote against the adjournment. They had long been here, and he wished to complete their business and return. He had expected the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay) would, before this, have brought in a resolution for adjournment by Monday week. He (Mr. B.) thought they could adjourn before that, and was now in favor of the despatch of business. He hoped the senator would not press the motion.

Mr. Sevier then withdrew this motion, and the senate adjourned till Monday next.

August 14. The bill from the house, to extend the time of issuing the Virginia military land warrants, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to provide for the distribution of the sixth census was read a third time and passed. The bill submitted a resolution calling on the postmaster general for information, at the present or next session, as to the number of new post routes created in Missouri since the 4th of March, the modes in which the mail is transported, and the number of horses and mules continuously.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, in relation to the providing by law, at the present session, to enable the postmaster general to liquidate the dues from the post office to the contractors was taken up and passed.

Mr. Sevier introduced a resolution calling on the postmaster general for information as to any changes in the mail routes to the state of Arkansas, since the 4th of March last, the modes of conveyance, and whether daily, tri-weekly or weekly.

Mr. Henderson also introduced a resolution in relation to mail routes.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Clay, of Ala. without any reply to the causes why the resolution submitted by him at the last session, calling for the issues made of script connected with Virginia military land warrants, had not been answered, was taken up.

After some remarks by Messrs. Clay, of Ky. Clay, of Ala. Berrien, Smith, of Indiana, King and Woodbury, Mr. Clay modified his resolution by erasing the words "without delay," and it was adopted.

Mr. Sevier said the hour had arrived for proceeding to the consideration of the orders of the day.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, said he would not call up the bill. There had been an understanding among the senators who had gone to Annapolis that the bill should not be taken up in their absence, to which he had yielded a reluctant assent. Under these circumstances, he would rather it be postponed till Monday.

Mr. Sevier insisted upon the orders of the day—Yesterday, when he moved to adjourn over, it was objected to on the other side, and he withdrew the motion; and, whilst he had remained to attend to his business, he found, on coming here this morning, that the most of them had gone.

Mr. Calhoun moved to adjourn; but this motion was lost.

After some further remarks from Messrs. Sevier, Kerr, Smith, of Inda. Archer, Mangum, and others, Mr. Henderson moved to postpone the orders of the day for the purpose of taking up a resolution which he had submitted.

Mr. Sevier asked the yeas and nays, and said he should resist it if he stood alone.

And the question having been taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Linn, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Nicholson, Porter, Prentiss, Rice, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, Tappan, Woodbridge, Woodbury—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Berrien, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Fane, Nicholson, Parce, Rivers, Sevier, Sturgeon, Walker—10.

On motion of Mr. Huntington, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short session, adjourned till Monday.

Aug. 15. Mr. Clay presented the proceedings and resolutions of a highly respectable meeting of citizens of Buckingham county, Virginia, declaring the constitutionality of a national bank, and expressing an opinion with that it be established at this extra session; against the sub treasury, and desiring its repeal. Mr. C. said he was very happy the latter part of their wish had been complied with, and he hoped—although he must confess it was against opinion—that their other desire would be fulfilled, and that a bank would be established this session. The meeting also approved of the measures of this session, the distribution bill and bankrupt law, and denounced, in the high character of Virginia faith, the repeal of the bill of the repeal of the act, as violating the sacredness of contracts and honor of the country. On his motion the proceedings were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hend. had presented memorials from five or six importing houses engaged in the business of jewelry, watches, &c. representing that an increased duty on those articles would lessen the revenue, owing to the facility with which they are smuggled. They say that 5 per cent. would add more to the revenue than the 20 per cent. contemplated. Laid on the table and order to be printed.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. Linn, requesting the president of the United States to give notice to the British government, under the convention of 1827, for the permanent occupation of Oregon, &c. was taken up; and, after some remarks from Messrs. Linn and Prentiss, it was passed over informally.

The senate then proceeded to the order of the day, being the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved an amendment to the bill, which provided that there should be, at the time of the distribution, a surplus of a surplus equal to the amount of said net proceeds, after meeting and satisfying all demands against the U. States for current expenses and appropriations, and the necessary provision for the payment of any portion of the public debt.

On this amendment a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Benton and Clay, of Ala. participated.

The president's secretary, Mr. John Tyler, Jr. now appeared, having made his way with some difficulty through a crowd which surrounded the door of the senate chamber, and delivered a message from the president, returning the bill for the charter of a fiscal bank, with his objections thereto.

The further consideration of the land distribution bill was thereupon informally passed over, to be resumed to-morrow; and the message was read at the secretary's table.

At the close of the reading of the message there was a slight expression of applause in the gentleman's gallery, by striking on the floor with canes which was hastily followed by one or two rather faint lights.

Several venturers rose simultaneously, and a voice was heard loudly demanding that the galleries be cleared.

Mr. Benton rose at the same time, apparently under great excitement, and stated that these had been since in the gallery.

Another amendment, offered by Mr. Clay, of Ala. also unimportant in itself, was adopted.

Mr. Benton then offered an amendment to strike out "10 per cent. to the new states," and insert "12 1/2."

On this proposition a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Smith, of Indiana, Henderson, Woodbridge, White, Walker and others participated. No question was taken.

And the senate then adjourned.

August 18. The chair laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of the treasury, covering a report from the commissioner of the general land office, made in compliance with a resolution of the 12th inst. calling for the number of additional clerks appointed to the land office since the 4th of March last, with the salaries received, &c. Ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial from the manufacturers of chemical and dye stuffs, asking that cream of tartar may be admitted free of duty. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Kerr, from the committee on the Judiciary, reported the amendment made by his committee to the bill to amend an act entitled "an act to provide for the taking of the 6th census," with a recommendation that they be concurred in.

Mr. K. moved that the amendments be then concurred in, which was agreed to.

The amendments relate to the printing of 10,000 copies of the census returns, and binding the same in some cheap and substantial manner, provided that the cost do not exceed 50 cents per copy; and providing also for the printing of returns of Montgomery county, in Maryland, and adding the same to the enumeration of the state of Maryland.

Mr. Clay of Ala. objected to the amendments. If he mistook not, there was a proposition to alter the number of copies to a very great number, which were already printed would be thus, be sufficient. According to the rate fixed for distribution among the states, what came to the share of Alabama would be enough for all practical purposes. With regard to 50 cents per copy for binding, he thought no price should be considered, however such cheaper the work might be done, it would never be fixed at a less rate than that mentioned.

Mr. Clayton understood the bill to provide for the binding of the copies of the census, which would be of little use except substantially though plainly bound.

Mr. Calhoun insisted there was a proposition to print extra copies, or his ears had deceived him, and asked for the reading of the bill.

The amendments having been read, Mr. Clayton moved to recommit the bill; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Benton,
Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate what amount of public lands are now surveyed and prepared for market, and which have not yet been advertised for sale; also, what amount of public lands have been advertised for sale since the 4th day of March last; and what amounts of land have been heretofore advertised for sale by proclamations issued from March to August, inclusive, during the last four years.

Mr. Wright submitted the following:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of a naval cutter, to be employed in the revenue cutter service of the United States by the president and senate in the same manner that commissioned officers in the naval service of the United States are appointed; and also, of prescribing by law a just and proper rank as between them and the officers of the navy when both are employed together upon the same service; and to report on the report by him or otherwise at the next session of congress.

Mr. Woodbury submitted the following, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the extent and character of the disturbances in the galleries of the senate at two successive sessions of the present extra session, in the final passage of the bill for the fiscal bank of the United States, and one on the reading of the veto of said bill, and that they report on the same, and what further legislation may be necessary to prevent or punish similar interruptions of the public business hereafter.

Also, that the said committee inquire and report in respect to the disturbances at or near the president's house on the night ensuing the said veto; the description and object thereof, the number and names of the persons concerned in them, so far as they can be ascertained; the punishment, if any, to which they have been subjected by the civil authorities for a breach of the public peace, or for riotous and tumultuous behavior on that occasion; and to recommend any additional measures, of a legislative character or otherwise, which, in their opinion be proper for the prevention of different instances of the general kind hereafter, by violent molestation, disturbance and interruption, while engaged in the discharge of their public duties in the city of Washington. And said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons said papers.

The bill extending the time for issuing military bounty land warrants was then taken up.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, explained the object of the bill.

Messrs. Benton, Pierce and McRoberts, spoke against it; when

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, replied; and the bill was passed over informally, and the letter received from Mr. Gordon, of the bounty land office, ordered to be printed.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the president proclaimed the order of the day, which was the consideration of the objections of the president of the U. States to the bill chartering a fiscal bank.

Mr. Benton rose and said that, under a sense of duty, he was induced to move that the consideration of the executive message accompanying the return to the senate of the bill to establish a fiscal bank be further postponed until to-morrow, twelve o'clock.

Mr. Calhoun said he did hope that the consideration would not be postponed. He did not, indeed, insist that the constitution required that the senate should proceed to such consideration immediately. A reasonable time ought to be allowed; but it was not his object to delay the bill, but to get some longer postponement should be permitted. The president's message containing his objections to the bill had now been in possession of the senate and of the tables of members for two days. Surely there had been sufficient time to reflect upon it, yet no motion was proposed still longer to defer action upon it. He asked the honorable senator to assign some reason for the proposed delay.

Mr. Berrien replied, that when the senator from South Carolina conceded that there was no immediate constitutional necessity for taking up the message, he conceded all that was necessary to cover the motion. When the senator expressed his personal conviction that time enough had been allowed for reflection on the message, he expressed what would no doubt regulate his personal conduct; but when Mr. B. stated that, under a sense of duty, he had asked for further time, he had stated his own conviction in regard to the course which ought to be pursued. Senators would decide for themselves which opinion was to prevail.

Mr. Calhoun rejoined. The senator had admitted that the considerations on which he had come to the conclusions mentioned were confined to his own breast; and, if so, how were other gentlemen to judge of their force? Were the motives such as could not be publicly looked at? Were they founded on movements external to that chamber? It was certainly due to the senate that a reason be given; it was quite novel to refuse; some reason was always given; it had never known it to be otherwise.

Mr. Berrien said that the senator was at liberty to suggest whatever he might think proper; but that he should not conclude Mr. B. as having made a motion here for reasons which he could not disclose.

He submitted to the senate that there were upon the face of the paper itself ample reasons, from the importance of its subject-matter, why it should be maturely considered. If the senator thought otherwise, he would, of course, resist the motion to postpone.

Mr. Calhoun said that, as this was a very extraordinary motion, the votes of senators upon it ought to be taken; he would therefore demand the yeas and nays. They were ordered accordingly, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Clay, Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Foster, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Sumners, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Faxon, Linn, McKim, McRoberts, Monro, Nicholson, Porter, Sevier, Stuart, Tallmadge, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Yeates—21.

So the consideration of the message was postponed till to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the general order, bearing the distribution and prepayment of bills.

The amendment of Mr. Benton was still pending, viz: to strike out ten per cent. to the new states, and insert twelve and a half.

The question was taken on this amendment without further debate, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Calhoun, Linn, McKim, Monro, Porter, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Woodbridge, Young—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Clay, Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Nicholson, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, White, Williams—27.

Mr. Fulton then moved to amend the bill so that the distribution of the net proceeds of the public lands should be made, with the representation of the several states in congress.

On this proposition, a long and animated discussion ensued, in which Messrs. Fulton, of Arkansas, Smith, of Indiana, Woodbury, Walker, White, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Linn, King and others participated.

A message was now received from the other house announcing the passage of the bankrupt bill, with amendments.

Mr. Walker immediately moved to postpone the further consideration of the land bill, with a view to take up the bankrupt bill, as amended.

Mr. Linn called the yeas and nays on the motion, and, on the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, Ky. Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merriek, Miller, Morehead, Nicholson, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Woodbridge—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Calhoun, Faxon, Graham, King, Linn, McKim, Monro, Pierce, Sevier, Sumners, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Yeates—20.

The amendments were then taken up, which, after having been briefly explained by Mr. Berrien, a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Buchanan, Walker, Benton, Calhoun, Clayton, Calhoun, Clay, of Ky. Allen, and others participated; and the question was taken on agreeing in the amendments, and carried in the affirmative; and the senate then adjourned.

August 19. After two successive disappointments, on previous days, from votes to postpone, the question at last came up, at 12 o'clock, on considering the executive communication containing the president's objections to the bill chartering a fiscal bank.

Mr. Clay addressed the senate in a very eloquent speech in vindication of the course of the senate in relation to the bill, and particularly that in respect to the 10th or compromise section, against which the objection was made. He was expressed with peculiar emphasis. After going through with examination of several positions taken in the message, and replying to the president's objections, Mr. C. adverted to the fact that some of his friends round him were engaged in the preparation of a new bill, and, without pledging himself to any course respecting it until he should see its precise form, Mr. C. expressed his hope that they would go on, and render it as perfect as possible. And he concluded with congratulating the country on the many important measures which had been carried through both houses during the present extra session, and expressing his hope that, if not now, at the regular session something might be done to put the currency of the country on a safe and solid and satisfactory basis.

Mr. Rives followed in a speech vindicating the course of the president, on which he passed the highest eulogiums. He seemed inclined to treat Mr. Clay's speech as an attack on the president for treachery to the treasury, and to the public credit. He repeated explanations which passed between the two senators. Mr. Clay disclaimed all such purpose, and testified that he considered as misrepresentations (though unintentional ones of course) of most of the points he had taken.

Mr. T. concluded by expressing an earnest hope that no new bill would be brought in, but that the question would be referred over to the people. He, however, such a bill should be reported as he could conscientiously support, it should have his vote.

Mr. Clay rejoined in a second speech, (which became unusually impassioned and close), and in which he warmly replied the imputation of having attacked the president, or charge him with treachery. He alluded to the long and friendly friendship, declared it to be unquarrelled by what had transpired, and his desire for its long continuance; but alluded to a rumor of the existence of a certain cabal, which claimed to be the president's friends and advisers, and who surrounded and sought to guide him as a sort of a second kitchen cabinet—whose object was the dissolution of the high party, the dissolution of congress, and a change in the whole face of the affairs of the country. These were the words which he uttered, and he endeavored to pour poison into his hearer, with a view to separate him from Mr. C. If the president should choose, though Mr. C. was sure he could not, to lend his ear to such advisers, and separate himself from him, he should deeply regret it for the sake of their common country.

Mr. Rice also spoke, agreeing with much animation and earnestness, still taking the ground that Mr. C. had attacked the president. (Mr. C. still disclaiming and correcting his representations of what had passed.)

Mr. Clay said a few more things. In a more playful spirit than before, in reply to Mr. R.'s last remarks.

Mr. Archer made an effort to bring Mr. Clay to a disclaimer of any allusion to his colleagues in the house of representatives in what he had said about a kitchen cabinet.

Mr. Clay denied that he had asserted the existence of such a cabinet; he had stated the existence of such a rumor, and asked Mr. A. if he had never heard of it. As those colleagues being implicated, that as Mr. A.'s own inference, not Mr. C.'s assertion.

After several inquiries and replies had passed, in the last of which Mr. C. refused to go further in his disclaimer.

Mr. Berrien stated to Mr. Archer what Mr. Clay had said; with which Mr. A. professed himself satisfied, and the inquiry dropped.

The question was then (at past 5 o'clock) taken upon the passage of the bank bill, and decided by yeas and nays—yeas 77, nays 40.

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Chase, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mansueti, Morris, M'Nabb, Norcross, of Pennsylvania, Preston, Sumner, Smith, of Ind. Southern, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mouton, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—25.

There not being the constitutional majority of two-thirds in favor of the bill, which would be requisite to entitle it to be sent to the house of representatives for the like concurrence there, the bill remains finally rejected.

The acute then, after an exhausting session of seven hours adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Aug. 20. Mr. Barnard offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Friday next, the 13th instant, at 12 o'clock meridian, all debate in committee of the whole on the state of the bankrupt law be suspended, and a committee of the whole be appointed to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on any question then pending, and on any amendment thereto, or any other bill then offered, and shall then report said bill to the house, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee. Provided, that nothing in this resolution shall preclude the committee from reporting and bill at an earlier hour.

Mr. Morgan inquired of the speaker whether it was in order to call up the resolution offered by his colleague, (Mr. J. G. Floyd), in relation to the McLeod affair? And stated that he was desirous of making some remarks upon the resolution.

The speaker decided that the resolution of the gentleman's colleague (Mr. Barnard) had precedence.

Some conversation followed.

Mr. Wise moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "Friday next, at 12 o'clock meridian," and inserting "to-day, at 3 o'clock, P. M."

On this, the vote stood—yeas 27, nays 64. No quorum voting, a call of the house was ordered, and proceeded in, till 136 members answered to their names, when it was suspended.

The previous question having been ordered, Mr. Wise's amendment was rejected.

Mr. Andrew, of Kentucky, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was decided in the negative: yeas 56, nays 99.

And the question recurring on its adoption—

Mr. Jones asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken were yeas 78, nays 89. So the resolution was not adopted.

On leave, Mr. Wise, from the committee on naval affairs, reported back to the house the bill providing for the payment of navy pensions, which had been returned from the senate with amendments, in which the committee recommended the concurrence of the house.

The amendments were understood to be that no new cases should be admitted under the law of 1837, and prescribing the time during which the persons already granted under the law should be received.

Some explanations followed, between Messrs. Wise, Fillmore, Adams, McKay, Chase Johnson and Briggs.

When Mr. Adams moved to amend the amendment of the senate, by adding thereto a proviso that "nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to affect pensions granted to officers, seamen and marines by special act of congress, in which act such officer, seaman or marine shall be designated by name."

Mr. Wise moved the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question (being the first on the amendment to the amendment, as proposed by Mr. Adams) was ordered to be put; and, being put, was decided in the negative: yeas 64, nays 100. So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

And the amendments of the senate were then considered.

On leave given, Mr. Stearns presented the resolutions of a portion of the citizens of Wheeling, Virginia, protesting against the incorporation of a bank of the United States, and avowing the right of the people to repeal any such incorporation.

All of the resolutions of a meeting of the citizens of Ohio county, holden at Tinsdell, remonstrating against the legislation of congress at this session, and avowing the right of the people to repeal the charter of a bank of the United States.

All of which were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Tillinghast, of Rhode Island, in the chair), on the bill from the senate to provide for the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Gordon to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Mr. Milton Brown, after congratulating himself and the house that the bill now under consideration was a measure wholly unconnected with party politics, said that it united considerations of the wisest national policy with those of humanity and justice.

Mr. H. proceeded at length in support of the bill, pled in conclusion, dwelt in a feeling manner on the happiness which the passage of such a bill would diffuse through many a dejected and desponding heart, and the satisfaction derived from the consciousness of having aided in an act of policy, justice and benevolence.

Mr. Hunt, after complimenting the chairman of the judiciary committee (Mr. Barnard) on the tone of remark in which he had introduced and pressed the bill upon the committee, proceeded to remark upon the condition of his own district, and the wishes of his constituents in relation to the bill; it was not a debtor, but emphatically a creditor district—agricultural, manufacturing and commercial in its pursuits; yet they had petitioned in favor of the bill, not only from motives of compassion, but from an enlarged view of their own true interest.

He made some general remarks on the beneficial tendencies of a general bankrupt law, as experienced in other countries, and in its necessity here, as permanent provision in our commercial system.

Mr. H. argued to show the impolicy of attempting to load the bill with a clause to include banking corporations; nor would it do for gentlemen voting against the bill to cloak their opposition under the plea of a provision never introduced, the people understood the case, and no such plea would stand. There was no fitness in extending bankrupt provisions to corporations; they had none of the attributes of natural persons; better leave the bankrupt to state his condition.

Mr. H. said he should offer an amendment exempting printed books of bankrupts to the value of fifty dollars.

As he should have no opportunity to explain this amendment, would not do, he was desirous of saving to the bankrupt his Bible, Prayers Book and common school books to at least that amount.

Mr. H. said he should also, as at present advised, propose to postpone the operation of the act to some day in January next, instead of the 1st November, or 1st December.

This he should do because congress would be in session at that time. Amendments might be suggested, and still the country would have the full benefit of the assurance that we designed relieving the unfortunate.

Mr. Pope observed that there seemed a very decided disposition to pass this bill; and he therefore felt bound to state that it contained some principles which, if he rightly understood them, he never could understand.

Mr. P. continued to oppose the passage of the bill, contending that a bankrupt law was needed only by commercial men and in commercial concerns. This had been the character of the bill of 1800, and so had been the understanding ever since, till this extraordinary bill, which he insisted contained some of the greatest enormities he had ever seen attempted in legislation.

[The committee rose informally to enable the house to receive a report by Mr. Handolph, from the committee on enrolled bills, who reported that the committee had examined the bill to provide for the payment of navy pensions, and had found the same to be correct; whereupon, the bill received the signature of the speaker. And the chairman again resumed his seat.]

Mr. Allen, of Maine, briefly addressed the committee. After examining the constitutional question and noticing some of the objections taken to the bill, he went on to say, that a bankrupt law had, heretofore, met the approval and support of many of the distinguished men in this country, whose hearts had been enlisted in the cause of justice and of suffering humanity. He expressed his most sincere hope that this bill would be passed, as he was sure it would bring joy and comfort to the hearts of sorrowing and desponding thousands.

The chairman gave the floor to Mr. Birdseye, who yielded to Mr. Waller, on whose motion the committee rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Everett, certain additional papers relating to the Mexican commission were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Barnard gave notice that he would, to-morrow introduce a resolution to terminate the debate on the bankrupt bill.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore (by leave), an extra number of certain tables furnished from the treasury department, in relation to the revenue bill, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Waller moved that the house adjourn; but withdrew the motion to enable

Mr. Wise to move that the committee of the whole on the state of the union be discharged from the further consideration of the bankrupt bill, on which motion Mr. W. moved the previous question.

Pending this motion, the house adjourned.

Friday, Aug. 21. Mr. Sergeant offered a resolution that when the house adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday, at 10 A. M. Passed, yeas 112, nays 40.

Mr. Barnard (according to notice given yesterday) introduced a resolution to enter the debate on the bankrupt bill in committee of the whole, to remain till 10 o'clock to-day. The resolution was passed: 74 to 6.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the bankrupt bill, Mr. Tillinghast in the chair.

Mr. Birdseye spoke for an hour against the policy of the bill in its present form; but was very imperfectly heard, from the great noise arising from general conversation in the hall. During a great part of the time, he was totally inaudible from the noise of conversation which continued (notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the chairman and the appeals of various members) throughout the whole day's session. The minds of the great majority of members were evidently occupied in the consideration of some subject totally foreign to that before the house. Mr. Birdseye, however, expressed a determination to present certain amendments designed to obviate those objections to the bill which were now, in his view, conclusive against it.

Mr. Key next obtained the floor, and signified his wish to be very brief in explanation of certain intended amendments, on account of the number of members desirous of speaking during the brief remaining time allowed for debate under the resolution passed this morning. He spoke against the present bill for half an hour.

Mr. Smith, of Conn. moved that the committee rise for a few minutes, with a view to reconsider, in the house, the resolution adopted, ordering the debate to close at two o'clock.

After some remarks from Messrs. Barnard, Wise and Rosser, the committee voted to rise: yeas 79, nays 29.

On the committee rising and reporting the bill, Mr. Wise moved a call of the house, as this was to be a "test question." The call was refused: 71 to 82.

Mr. Smith, of Conn. then moved to reconsider the resolution to close the debate at two o'clock; and on this he moved the previous question.

Mr. Proffit moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and on this he asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was then negatively decided: yeas 88.

Mr. Wise moved that the house do again resolve itself into committee of the whole, on the bankrupt bill.

The speaker decided that the motion was now out of order, pending the call for the previous question. The call for the previous question was then repeated. (Tellers having been ordered), ayes 85, noes 76.

The previous question was then ordered without a division.

The motion to reconsider was then passed, (the yeas and nays being ordered on motion of Mr. Wise), yeas 102, nays 95.

Mr. Ahterton moved a reconsideration of the vote on the resolution adopted this morning to adjourn over till Monday.

Mr. Pennington moved to lay on the table.

On motion of Mr. Proffitt, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table; yeas 101, nays 94.

A communication from the secretary of plate, relative to the census, was then presented and referred to the committee of the whole, before whom was the bill on that subject.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole. Mr. Tillgham in the chair.

Mr. Williams moved to take up the senate bill relating to the census.

Mr. Barnard declared it out of order and the chairman decided that the bankrupt bill was still before the committee.

Mr. Wise then spoke for a few minutes against the shifting distorities of all these recent amendments in reference to the bill, as secretly designed for political effect. The poor bankrupts were to be charged out of the expected relief, or to be gratified only in certain contingencies which were now to be waited for. He expressed his own personal opposition to the bill.

Mr. Briggs replied to Mr. Wise, disclaiming for himself and the friends of the bill, the imputations cast upon them. He had congratulated himself on the fair, open, candid character of the debate upon the bill, so far. It had been remarkably free from a partisan character. (Mr. Wise explained that he had charged only persons of the pretended friends of the bill with so doing.)

Mr. Morgan made a brief but animated and forcible speech in reply to Mr. Wise.

Messrs. White, of Ind. and Sellers, followed in favor of the bill, and Mr. Williams, of Maryland, against it.

Mr. Holmes obtained the floor; and the committee then, on motion of Mr. Underwood, rose and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. Underwood, the committee of the whole on the state of the union was discharged from the further consideration of the senate bill in relation to the census.

And the bill being before the house—on motion of Mr. Williams, of Maryland, it was amended by providing for the binding of the compendium.

Mr. Randall, of Maryland, moved that the bill be further amended by providing for the printing of 20,000 copies of the compendium instead of 10,000. Mr. R. stated that there had been already appropriated upwards of $700,000 for the expenses of taking the census; that by this bill 10,000 copies of the census at large, and 10,000 copies of the compendium, were directed to be printed. The object of his motion was to increase the copies of the compendium to 20,000.

This committee had been prepared in the office of the secretary of state, in toto form, and contained, arranged by counties and cities, all the statistics of the census at large.

The increase in the population and intelligence of the country, the number of universities, schools, public libraries, &c. required that this number should be printed, in order to secure the proper circulation of this valuable document at present, and to retain a sufficient number for future circulation.

This was no ordinary document. In addition to the most detailed descriptions of the population, it contained, among other things, much valuable information touching the various products, &c. of the country. It was not, like many of the documents published in numbers quite as great by the house, merely for a temporary use. This would be important throughout all time, as the only correct source from which the statistics of the country could be obtained. It was due also to our country that many copies of this census should be sent abroad to foreign countries, in order to extend correct information on these important subjects.

As this immense expense had already been incurred, it was surely worth the additional amount required, (about $7,000), in order to have the number of copies of this valuable document increased one-half.

He regretted that the committee should have declined to accept his amendment when the bill was before them; but duty compelled him to urge it again upon the house.

The amendment was adopted. Mr. Randall also moved to amend the bill by inserting a new section providing for the retaking of the census of Montgomery county, Maryland.

Mr. R. made some explanatory remarks in relation to this amendment.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. Roosevelt. The printing of the census, he said, would be delayed by it for five months. He demanded the previous question. And there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken. On the suggestion of Mr. Kennedy, of Maryland, Mr. Randall modified his amendment so as to provide that the printing of the census should not be delayed by the operation of the amendment, but that the additional statements should be printed separately.

The main question (being first on the amendment) was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: ayes 74, noes 48. So the amendment was agreed to.

And the question recurring on engrossing the amendments and ordering the bill to a third reading—Mr. Chapman asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

But, pending the question, the house adjourned until Monday morning at ten o'clock.

Monday, Aug. 18. Mr. Linn, by general consent, presented a petition of the inhabitants of Saratoga, New York, praying for a bankrupt law confined to natural persons, and not including corporations; which was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, having charge of the subject.

Mr. Hunt, of New York, by general consent, presented the petition of E. Peck and others, manufacturers of iron in and near the city of New York, asking the appointment of a committee of congress to collect facts, &c. preparatory to a revision of the tariff laws, &c.

Several other petitions were presented, and all appropriately referred to the proper committee.

On leave given, Mr. Hopkins offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting, in all authorized reports, to the committee, to establish express routes along the great lines of steamboat and rail road communications in cases where it is not able to make contracts to have the mails transported, and routes by rail roads or steamboats for the rate of compensation prescribed by law.

On leave given, Mr. Welles presented the proceedings of a democratic meeting held in Hamilton, in the state of Ohio, on the 31st July last, against the incorporation of a national bank, against the repeal of the independent treasury, against the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, &c.; which, on motion, were laid on the table.

Mr. Fillmore, from the committee of ways and means, to whom had been referred the communication from the president in relation to further appropriations for the general post office, reported that the committee had had the same under consideration and declined reporting any appropriation thereon.

Mr. Fillmore, from the same committee, to whom had been referred the communication from the secretary of war asking for appropriations to carry into effect the treaty with the Miami Indians, reported that the committee did not conceive that the bill came within the rule adopted by this house, limiting and prescribing the business which should be acted on during the present session of congress.

Mr. Fillmore, from the same committee, to whom had been referred the petition of certain stonecutters asking further appropriations for the public buildings, asked that the said committee be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the subject be referred to the committee on public buildings.

And the subject was referred accordingly.

Mr. Randolph, from the committee on enrolled bills, reported that that committee had examined the bill in relation to fees and recoveries under the charter laws and ordinances of Georgetown, &c. and had found the same to be correct. And the bill received the signature of the speaker.

Mr. Gilmer, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to provide for placing Georgetown state of Washington in the returns of the nation.

The bill, having been read twice by its title, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

And the question recurring on the post office and post roads, reported the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be directed to deliver to the auditor of the treasury for the post office department such of the papers taken from the post office department before its destruction by fire, by the committee of investigation of the house of representatives, as the said auditor may select.

Mr. Wise desired to inquire of the chairman of the committee on the expenditures of the post office department, or of the committee on the post office and post roads, whether any action would be proposed on the communication from the master general in relation to the arrearages due from that department to contractors?

Mr. Briggs (chairman of the committee on the post office and post roads) replied that that committee had the subject under consideration now.

Mr. Wise was understood to say that calls for information on the subject had been addressed to him, and to other members of the house. The session was nearly at a close, and, unless something was done soon, congress would adjourn without doing any thing.

Mr. W. W. Irwin, from the select committee on retrenchment, reported the following resolution: Resolved, That the chairman of the committee ask leave to sit on the floor during the next congressional session, and that the committee have power to send for papers and papers, and to report at the next session by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Andrew, of Kentucky moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. W. W. Irwin asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, yeas 139, nays 40. So the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. W. C. Johnson, the house took up the census bill, the pending question was on engrossing the amendments (made on Friday), and on ordering the bill to a third reading, on previous motion the previous question had heretofore been ordered.

Some conversation followed, in which Messrs. W. C. Johnson and Roosevelt participated.

After which the resolution was taken by yeas and nays, (which had heretofore been ordered), and was decided in the affirmative: yeas 121, nays 63.

So the amendments were ordered to be engrossed. And the bill was ordered to a third reading at this time.

And, having been read a third time by the title, the bill was passed.

A message was received from the president of the United States, by the hands of Robert Tyler, equiforming the bill, (Mr. Tillgham, of Rhode Island, signed a bill entitled "an act to provide for the payment of navy pensions."

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union. (Mr. Tillgham, of Rhode Island, in the chair), on the bill from the senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Gordon, of New York, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee during the hour in opposition to the bill, which he characterized as complex and destructive in its nature, and as fraught with deep injury to the credit of the country.

Mr. James spoke for half an hour with much animation and force in defence of the bill.

Mr. Stone, of New York, then addressed the bill.

Mr. Howard also spoke in favor of the bill. Mr. Barnard said that, if there were no other gentlemen desirous to speak, he would move that the committee now rise; giving notice, at the same time, that he would introduce a resolution providing that all debate on the bill should cease at 12 o'clock, M.

Mr. Wise inquired of the chair if the motion to rise was amendable. If so he would move to amend it by adding the words "and report the same."

The chair decided that the motion was not amendable; that motion, in committee, being equivalent to a motion for adjournment in the house.

And the question being taken, the motion, by yeas 78, noes 60, prevailed. And the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. Boile said he had received from the marshal of the District the accounts and vouchers for the federal expenses of the late president of the United States, (gen. William Henry Harrison), for which the appropriation had yet been made.

On motion of Mr. B. the yeas were referred to the committee on ways and means.

Mr. Fillmore presented a communication from the secretary of the navy, in relation to the status of Washington; which was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union having charge of the bill on that subject.

Mr. Underwood submitted a motion that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of taking up certain bills (heretofore reported) from the committee on public lands, in relation to military bounty land claims.

Pending which motion, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Aug. 17. On leave given, Mr. Triplett, of Ky., presented the petition of R. F. Kelly and forty-one other citizens of Hopkinsville, Ky., in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law.

Also, of G. A. Kinison and sixty-two other citizens of Henderson county, against the passage of a bankrupt law.

Also, of John B. Frost and sixty-one other citizens of Hopkins city, against the passage of a bankrupt bill.

Mr. Kennedy, of Maryland, on leave given, presented a petition from citizens of Baltimore, praying the appointment of a committee of investigation to inquire into the practical operation of the existing tariff laws.

On motion of Mr. K. the petition was referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. Mathies, on leave given, presented the proceedings of a public meeting of the democracy of Licking county, in the state of Ohio, in strong opposition to the leading whig measures, &c. Laid on the table.

On leave given, Mr. Briggs, from the committee on the post office and post roads, reported a bill making appropriations for the post office department.

[This bill appropriates the sum of $197,657 to enable the department "to meet its engagements and pay its debts."

The bill having been read twice by the title, was referred on motion of Mr. Briggs, to the committee of the whole on the state of the union; and, together with the communication from the post office department, was ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the senate through A. Dickinson, esq. secretary, informing this house that the senate had passed the act further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants and returning surveys thereof to the general land office.

And, also, informing the house that the president of the United States had officially notified the senate that he had approved and signed the bill to repeal an act commonly known as the sub-treasury law.

Mr. Barnard offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That at 12 o'clock M. this day, all debate on matters of the whole of the state of the union on senate bill No. 3, entitled "an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on any question, or on any amendments then pending, and on all amendments that may be offered, and shall then report said bill to the house, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee. Provided, That the committee may report said bill to the house at an earlier hour if they think proper.

Mr. Graham moved to amend the resolution by substituting 2 o'clock for 12.

Mr. Knapp, of Md. moved to amend the amendment by striking out 2 o'clock of this day, and inserting 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. And the amendment, by ayes 50, noes not counted, was also rejected.

And then the resolution as originally offered was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Barnard, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Tilgham, of Rhode Island, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Gordon, of New York, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Barnard, (chairman of the judiciary committee), addressed the committee in reply to some of the arguments which had been urged in opposition to the bill, concluding with a renewed and most urgent appeal to the house no longer to withhold from the country this great measure of relief, emancipation and justice.

Mr. Stillman, gave his views in favor of the bill.

Mr. Fillmore followed in some remarks, in favor of the bill, and Mr. Spry in opposition to it.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the committee, in pursuance of the order of the house of this morning, proceeded, without further debate, to vote on the amendments pending, or that might be offered.

The question was taken first on the motion of Mr. Gordon to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and by ayes 73, noes 90, it was rejected.

The first section of the bill being under consideration, Mr. Roosevelt moved to amend the same, by adding to the end thereof an additional proviso, "that no petition under this act shall be presented or filed before the 15th day of February next;" which amendment was rejected.

Mr. Clifford moved an amendment, that nothing contained in the bill should be construed to alter or repeal any state law for the relief of insolvent debtors, or to alter or repeal any such law exempting such goods or chatties from attachment, execution, or distress; which amendment was rejected.

Mr. Roosevelt offered to amend the section by inserting "that every corporation issuing notes or bills to be in circulation as money, and which, after the — day of — next, shall fail for thirty days to redeem such notes or bills according to the tenor and legal effect thereof, shall be deemed bankrupt." Rejected by ayes 56, noes 80.

Several other amendments were offered by Messrs. Randall, of Md. Underwood Roosevelt and Holmes, all of which were rejected.

Amendments were moved to several succeeding sections, all which were rejected.

And the 17th section being under consideration— Mr. Barnard moved to amend it so as to provide that the bill shall take effect on the 1st of February, 1842, instead of the 1st of November, 1841.

Mr. Maxwell moved to amend the amendment by striking out the 1st day of March for the 1st day of February. Rejected.

And the amendment of Mr. Barnard was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Adams, the words "and not sooner" were struck out of the said section.

Several other amendments were offered by Messrs. Roosevelt, Birdseye and Randall, of Md.; all which were rejected.

Mr. Williams, of Maryland, here offered a substitute for the bill, which was rejected.

And the 17th section of Mr. Barnard, the committee rose and reported the bill, with the only amendment made, to the house.

And the question being on concurring in that amendment, which provides that the bill should not go into effect until the 1st day of February next—

Mr. Clifford renewed the amendment offered by him in committee of the whole, and there rejected; offering it now as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. Barnard. Mr. C.'s proposition was in the following words: "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to alter or repeal any state law for the relief of insolvent debtors, or to alter or repeal any such law exempting such goods or chatties from attachment, execution or distress."

Mr. Barnard moved the previous question. And there was a second.

And the main question was ordered, (Saying first on amendments to the amendment).

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 93, noys 86; so the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

And the question recurring on agreeing to the amendment as amended—

Mr. Underwood (for the purpose, he said, of testing the sense of the house whether this bill should be laid over to the next session or not) moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. Weller asked the yeas and noys which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 119, noys 97, so the bill and amendments were laid on the table.

And on motion of Mr. Holmes, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Aug. 18. Mr. Gamble rose and moved the reconsideration of the vote of yesterday by which the bill from the senate to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States had been laid on the table.

Mr. Weller moved a call of the house, and asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered.

Mr. Cues Johnson moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The speaker decided that the motion for a call of the house had precedence.

And the question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Weller that there be a call of the house and was decided in the affirmative: yeas 170, noys 7.

The roll was called, 206 members appearing, and excuses received for several absentees, further proceedings in the call, on motion of Mr. Butts, were dispensed with, a vote of 111 to 76.

And the question then recurring on the motion of Mr. Gamble to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt bill had been laid on the table yesterday—

Mr. Cues Johnson asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 92, noys 111. So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

And the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Gamble to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt bill and amendments had been laid on the table.

Mr. Proffitt asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows: yeas 108, noys 88. So the vote was reconsidered.

And the question recurring on that motion, (to wit: to lay the bill and amendments on the table)—

Mr. Barnard asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows: yeas 90, noys 112. So the bill and amendments were not laid on the table.

Mr. Sellers thereupon rose, and moved that the house reconsider the vote of yesterday by which the following amendment, moved by Mr. Clifford to the amendment of Mr. Barnard, had been agreed to:

Provided, further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to alter or repeal any state law for the relief of insolvent debtors, or to alter or repeal any such law exempting certain goods or chatties from attachment, execution or distress.

And on this motion Mr. S. demanded the previous question.

Mr. Clifford asked Mr. S. to withdraw the motion, to enable him (Mr. C.) to say a word.

Mr. Sellers declined.

Here Mr. Fillmore introduced the honorable John T. Starnes, member from the state of Illinois, who was qualified and took his seat.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken. Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered.

And the main question (being on the motion to reconsider) was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 116, noys 93.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Clifford.

Mr. C. modified it to read as follows: "Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to alter or repeal any state law for the relief of insolvent debtors, or to alter or repeal any such law exempting certain goods and chatties from attachment, execution and distress, so that any insolvent debtor may at his election, either take the benefit of the provisions of this act relating to bankruptcy or of the state laws where he resides."

Mr. Lewis Williams would merely inquire, he said, whether that would be uniform bankrupt law?

Mr. Fillmore inquired of the speaker whether the previous question (ordered yesterday) would apply to this question?

The speaker replied that it would.

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and noys on the adoption of his amendment, as modified, which were ordered, and, being taken, were: yeas 90, noys 119.

And the question recurring on concurring in the amendment (to the 17th section) reported from the committee of the whole on the 21st of the union, and which amendment postponed the time at which the bill was to go into operation until the first day of February next, (the original day fixed in the bill being the first day of November current). The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in. And the amendment was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill (as amended was ordered to a third reading at this time.

And the bill having been read a third time by its title, and the question being on the final passage thereof, Mr. Briggs moved the previous question.

Mr. Weller asked the yeas and noys, remarking that he made the motion that it might be seen who dodged this question.

Mr. Proffitt asked the yeas and noys on the motion that there be a call of this house; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 89, noys 116. So the call of the house was ordered.

And the question recurring on the demand for the previous question there was a second.

And the main question (being on the passage of the bill) was ordered to be taken.

Mr. Clifford asked the yeas and noys, which were ordered. And the main question, "shall the bill pass?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Moore, Adams, Allen, S. J. Andrew, Ar-nold, Ayres, Babcock, Baker, Benson, Black, Brod-way, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Bouchay, Broussau, Mil-ton Brown, Bennett, Calhoun, Thomas J. So the bill was passed.

Mr. Morgan moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had passed, and demanded the previous question thereon, and there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

Mr. Boyd asked the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

And the main question: "shall the vote be reconsidered?" was then taken and decided in the negative: yeas 99, nays 116. So the vote was not reconsidered.

On motion of Mr. Underwood, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Boardman, of Connecticut, in the chair), and took up the bill from the senate to revise and extend, for a limited time, the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia; which bill had been reported from the committee for the District of Columbia of this house, with amendments.

The question being on concurring in an amendment reported by the committee of this house, viz: That out from one of the bills in the bill the provision forbidding the issuing and circulating hereafter of any notes of denominations between five and ten dollars and between ten and twenty dollars—

Mr. Underwood made some remarks in favor of concurring in the senate's amendment.

Mr. Case Johnson briefly stated reasons why he could not vote to concur.

Mr. Powell explained the reason and necessity for the amendment. A large portion of the circulation in this District consisted of bills of the banks of Virginia and Maryland. The Virginia notes were of various denominations between five and ten, and also between ten and twenty dollars, and as long as those banks continued to issue such notes it would be very difficult to exclude them from circulation. Besides, notes of these descriptions were very convenient for the purpose of small remittances; and as the charters for so long a term, and as the bills had been reported from the committee for the prohibition which the senate had stricken out he hoped the amendment would be concurred in.

The question was taken, and the senate's amendment was concurred in—yeas 107, nays 106.

The bill was then read through, and then read by sections for amendment.

Mr. Kern moved an amendment, to come in after the 6th section, providing that congress shall have power to revise, amend or revoke the charters.

This amendment gave rise to a discussion on the former conduct of the banks in which Messrs. Powell, Weller, Wise, Merrick, W. C. Johnson, Tillinghast, Proffit, Underwood, Snyder, Dawson and Case Johnson, took part; when

The question being now put on the amendment proposed by Mr. Kern, it was rejected without a count.

The reading of the bill having been gone through by—Mr. Underwood moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the house.

The motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the house. The question being put on concurring with the report of the committee, no quorum voted.

A motion was made to adjourn, and lost; yeas 70, nays 71.

[A message was received from the senate, by the hands of A. Dickens, ex. secretary, stating that the senate had concurred in the amendment made by this house to the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.]

The question being again put on concurring—Mr. Lewis Williams demurred the previous question; which was recorded, put and carried. And the main question being on concurring—Mr. Weller asked the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them. And the question to recur was carried.

The bill and amendments were then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

It was then being read a third time by its title, and the question being on its passage—Mr. Weller demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landolf, W. Andrews, Sherbrook, J. Andrews, Albany, Albany, Baker, Bernard, Black, Blair, Boardman, Bots, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, William Butler, John Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, John C. Clark, Clark, N. Clark, Aaron, Clamon, Cravens, Cushing, William C. Dawson, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Filmore, A. L. Foster, Thomas F. Foster, Gannett, Georty, Gogges, Fairbank, G. G. Good, H. H. Hall, Halsey, William S. Hastings, Henry, Huot, James Irvine, William W. Irwin, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lewis, Littlefield, A. M. C. Lellan, McKay, Malley, Marchand, T. F. Marshall, Mathers, Matlock, Medill, Miller, Newell, Rogers, Payson, Payne, Pickens, Plummer, Rogers, R. S. Ramsey, Reding, Rencher, Reth, Riggs, Rogers, Saunders, Shaw, Shepley, Sheld, Snyder, Spragg, Steenrod, Sweeney, J. B. Thompson, Triplett, Turner, Underwood, Van Cuylenburg, W. B. Underwood, Westbrook, J. W. Williams, Wise—106.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. Morgan moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had passed, and demanded the previous question thereon, and there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

Mr. Boyd asked the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

And the main question: "shall the vote be reconsidered?" was then taken and decided in the negative: yeas 99, nays 116. So the vote was not reconsidered.

On motion of Mr. Underwood, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Boardman, of Connecticut, in the chair), and took up the bill from the senate to revise and extend, for a limited time, the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia; which bill had been reported from the committee for the District of Columbia of this house, with amendments.

The question being on concurring in an amendment reported by the committee of this house, viz: That out from one of the bills in the bill the provision forbidding the issuing and circulating hereafter of any notes of denominations between five and ten dollars and between ten and twenty dollars—

Mr. Underwood made some remarks in favor of concurring in the senate's amendment.

Mr. Case Johnson briefly stated reasons why he could not vote to concur.

Mr. Powell explained the reason and necessity for the amendment. A large portion of the circulation in this District consisted of bills of the banks of Virginia and Maryland. The Virginia notes were of various denominations between five and ten, and also between ten and twenty dollars, and as long as those banks continued to issue such notes it would be very difficult to exclude them from circulation. Besides, notes of these descriptions were very convenient for the purpose of small remittances; and as the charters for so long a term, and as the bills had been reported from the committee for the prohibition which the senate had stricken out he hoped the amendment would be concurred in.

The question was taken, and the senate's amendment was concurred in—yeas 107, nays 106.

The bill was then read through, and then read by sections for amendment.

Mr. Kern moved an amendment, to come in after the 6th section, providing that congress shall have power to revise, amend or revoke the charters.

This amendment gave rise to a discussion on the former conduct of the banks in which Messrs. Powell, Weller, Wise, Merrick, W. C. Johnson, Tillinghast, Proffit, Underwood, Snyder, Dawson and Case Johnson, took part; when

The question being now put on the amendment proposed by Mr. Kern, it was rejected without a count.

The reading of the bill having been gone through by—Mr. Underwood moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the house.

The motion prevailing, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the house. The question being put on concurring with the report of the committee, no quorum voted.

A motion was made to adjourn, and lost; yeas 70, nays 71.

[A message was received from the senate, by the hands of A. Dickens, ex. secretary, stating that

into artificial pearls of great hardness. Aluminum is found to be deprived of all velocity, and hence it was impossible to spin threads from the ruby, or from Syrian garnet, topaz, fluorite of calcium (fluor spar) or the sandstone of Fontainebleau (Paris paving stone). He had made from melted quartz some admirable microscopic lenses, and pivots for miners' compasses; he had also drawn out sticks of quartz applicable to tools for barbers and watchmakers.

LOCOMOTIVES. A paragraph in the Philadelphia United States Gazette speaks of a very powerful locomotive engine which has just been finished by Messrs. Eastwick and Harrison of that city. "It is called the Macdon, and is finished on their peculiar plan, being that of having four driving and four truck wheels. The driving wheels are attached to the body of the engine in an entirely different manner from those of other engines, and are so fixed as to yield readily to any undulation of the road without jarring the engine. On a level it is calculated that it would draw one hundred loaded cars at the rate of twenty miles an hour. It has been constructed for the Auburn and Rochester road, and has been built thus powerfully in order to keep open the road during the winter season."

THE STEAMER GERM. A desideratum in ocean and canal navigation, so long and audaciously sought, is now clearly presented to the public in this simple and compact little vessel. She is propelled easily at the rate of 9 miles per hour, by two iron submerged horizontal paddle wheels, 5 feet in diameter, each paddle being just six inches by one foot.

Her length is 50 feet—beam 9 feet at water line, and 11 feet at the gunwale, and draws 2 feet 3 inches water. Although the whole power exerted by her engine is that of 6 2-3d horses, in a race she ran a few days since with a little steamer drawing 3 feet water, 73 feet long, and 5 feet beam, with a horse power engine applied to the ordinary paddle wheels, the "Germ" ranged ahead, and ran round her twice in 20 minutes, a fact establishing beyond doubt the superior efficiency of the horizontal paddle wheel.

In a heavy sea, the horizontal action of this propeller places the vessel so completely under control as to render her perfectly safe, and this propeller receiving the equal and effective resistance of so dense a medium as the water far below its surface imparts a steady and progressive movement, which carries the vessel through a head sea at a speed but little less than in smooth water.

The vessel is free from the weight and labor of the cumbersome water-wheel and axle, and the jar and shake consequent to the use of the presant paddle-wheel. She has the whole length of her deck for a saloon, unencumbered by wheel-houses, &c. and it is manifest the passages across the Atlantic will be made by the use of this invention in much less time, with greater safety and with far greater comfort.

The amount of freight too, which such a vessel may carry, is much larger than could be transported by a vessel built in the ordinary manner, for this reason, that the dip of the wheel, which would seriously impede the progress of the ordinary steamer, serves, in the case of the Germ, and of vessels built on her plan, to add, if any thing, to her sailing qualities.

The increased speed, with less power, resulting from the use of these new propellers, speaks the economy derivable from the adoption of this plan.

New York should not lose this opportunity of occupying her proper position in relation to Atlantic steam navigation.

MODE OF PRESERVING TIMBER. The Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal, for January, 1841, describes a patent lately obtained in the United States, for preserving wood by boiling it in lime water. The editor of that journal remarks, however, that lime can be much better preserved from decay by soaking it in a strong solution of lime in cold water. He assigns, as a reason for this, that a much greater quantity of lime, when fresh burned or calcined, is soluble in a given quantity of cold than of hot water; and also relates several satisfactory experiments, in which a quantity of lime, when thus used, in preserving timber from decay. The length of time for which the timber should be soaked depends very much upon the thickness and texture of the timber, and the quality of the lime, and may vary from a fortnight, and others three or four weeks, and even longer. An artificial pond, the sides made water-tight, is used for soaking the timber.

CHRONICLE.

ADULTERATION. The Cleveland, Ohio, Herald says, three citizens of Illinois, viz. John A. Wilson, a Wm. George Thompson—have been arrested in Marion Co. Missouri, and committed to jail, charged with attempting to entice away the slaves of Mr. Woodick, under promise to employ them in Canada. They are members of the "Mission Institute," near Quincy, Illinois, a kind of Ucherian altar. The Argus says of their guilt, there can be no doubt; and it is quite certain that they will have time enough for repentance in the penitentiary.

THE AMBIT AFRICANS. One of them was drowned at Falmouth, Conn. on the 7th inst.

BANK OF THE U. S. OF V. William Drexler having resigned, James Anderson, of Pa., has been elected president of this institution. There are indications of a disposition to recall the Biddle and discard the Lippincott party from the management of the institution. Mr. Samuel Jackson has been appointed to proceed to England to act as agent to the institution. The price of stock had declined to 14, has gone up to 14½—and discount on their notes fell from 25 to 22.

BRIEFER AND CORRUPTER. A young candidate for a seat in parliament naked, in a country town, what was most wanted, and was answered, "means to pay off the debt incurred by building our church." The candidate wrote a check for £100, and the next day was elected the member from that county.

CANTOR OIL. A western paper states that cantor oil is manufactured to a large extent in Illinois; in Randolph county alone, it is estimated that 100,000 barrels are annually made, and can be sold with great facility, and at little expense. When clarified the oil is and is given a much clearer light, than sperm oil, and is entirely free from offensive matter.

CHAMPAGNE WINE. A large bundle of some thousand champagne wine labels, lately passed through the Boston custom house, and have gone to New York; they were printed in England, and were for the use of the American market. Let champagne wine drinkers look out.

COTTON. A few bales of the new crop have reached the New Orleans and Mobile markets. Sales have almost ceased for a moment, all waiting to learn the product of the season, before advertising either to sell or buy in any quantities. Prices at New Orleans on the 7th inst., Liverpool goods are, ordinary M. 70; fine, 75; Louisiana, middling, 70; middling fair 8; 10; fair, fully fair and good fair 10; 1; 2; 3; 4; 5; 6; 7; 8; 9; 10; 11; THE NEW ORLEANS FLEET. The New Orleans fleet of cotton, in the vicinity of Natchez, has been greatly injured by long drought and insects here; on the point near the plant has nearly died all its forms, but the cotton and bollworms have been killed, and the uplands rice on the product of the second growth, and whether there will be a second growth depends entirely on the season. Nothing but heavy and abundant rains and a late fall will save any good crop.

CROPS. A review of all that we have met with in the public papers, relative to the crops of grain this season, confirms the impression, that the product upon the whole, will be nearly or quite an average. Maryland will certainly be light, but the wheat in the north and eastern Virginia also; but the year would be much above an average in which no section of the union failed. Wheat turns out much lighter than was expected in the middle states, and in New York and Ohio there will be some falling off from the average of 1839 and 1840—Michigan and Indiana will show an excess—rice failed extremely, but nearly every other crop has returned, and some are good—corn recovers considerably after having suffered by drought, but the crop will fall far below an average—potatoes and other vegetables are abundant, and of good quality.

ILLUSTRATIONS during the last week in Philadelphia 170, of which 99 were under two years, three over 30, and one over 100 years of age; 22 were people of color. In Baltimore 48, of which thirty-five were under two years, and one more for each age, and one for each sex.

Amongst the obituary notices of last week, we notice that of Gen. Griffin, a representative from South Carolina, in the last congress; Gen. James Lawrence, of New York, Conn. aged 72 years. For fifty years a member of the Connecticut bar; for a long time the state's attorney for his country; a member of the convention that secured the constitution of the United States; a member of one of the judges of the supreme court. Major Wm. Niles, an officer of the army of the revolution, at his residence in New York, on the 12th inst., aged 82 years. On the 8th inst. at his residence in Grainger county, Tennessee, William Clay, esq. father of the hon. C. C. Clay, senator in congress from Alabama. He was born in the county of Gloucester, Virginia, on the 11th of August 1769. Consequently, when he died, he was within 1 week of completing his 81st year. He entered the revolutionary army at the early age of sixteen, and served a campaign of duty with the militia of his native state, and aided in the closing scene of the war at the siege of Yorktown and the capture of Lord Cornwallis. He resided for many years in the county of Halifax, Va. where he resided several years. He then removed to the western country, and settled in Tennessee, where he spent the forty-five years of his life. He was a man of great industry and numerous descendants. A man named Boisard, a Canadian by birth, died lately in Lafayette Parish, in Louisiana, at the age of one hundred and eighteen.

DEATHS. Every thing in any way connected with the Great West, necessarily goes off with celerity and dispatch. She herself on Saturday left the wharf precisely at the time designated, and even a peck-pole, by the name of Harvard and Scuffin, which had been added "off" by the police officers, before he had time to transfer to his own pocket the wallet legitimately belonging to the pocket of a southern gentleman who witnessed the departure, and who was a noble steamer. The case was presented to the grand jury, a true bill immediately found, he put upon trial, found guilty by the jury without leaving their seats, and shortly after was on his way to Sing Sing, where he is to be employed the next five years in picking stone instead of peckers. (New York Times.)

ELECTIONS. The returns so far received, indicate that Alabama has elected an increased number of Van Buren members to their legislature.

Tennessee. Jones, the whig candidate for governor is ahead of Gov. V. B. by 30,000 as far as heard from 4,200 votes, and in Washington is elected to give the composition of the legislature is not yet ascertained. There are 25 senatorial districts in the state, which in the last legislature were divided by 14 in Van Buren and 11 in Whigs. So far the whigs have gained one senator and four representatives, losing none. The house has 75 members of which last season 42 were Van Buren and 33 whigs.

Two United States senators are to be chosen by the legislature now elected.

Indiana. Last session the whigs had a large majority in the popular branch. A considerable majority of Van Buren members are now elected to that body—numbers not yet ascertained. The senate will probably be elected in Washington is elected to give the vote in favor of the bankrupt bill on its final passage.

Illinois. Two Van Buren and one whig representative are elected to congress. The latter, Mr. Stuart is elected to Washington is elected to give the vote in favor of the bankrupt bill on its final passage.

EXCHANGE in New York upon England 98½; upon France 61, 21. At this rate of exchange on France specie again leaves us to pay a balance.

FLOUR. There were inspected during the last week in Baltimore 12,905 bbls. and 1,286 half bbls. The demand is active, the prices maintained as our last quotations.

GAS. On the 1st of January, 1841, the capacity of the gas establishment of this city could be set down as capable of producing 200,000 cubic feet of gas daily; and by filling up an additional series of gas pipes, as proposed, will be increased to 400,000 cubic feet daily. The whole quantity manufactured during the last year was 45,110,000 cubic feet, and the average consumption was 125,000 cubic feet daily. The gas is sold to private consumers and public lamps through nearly thirty miles of street mains. The number of private lights on the register on the 1st of July was 17,790, and 2,203 consumers; the public lamps amounted to 727. (Phil. Ledger.)

MACKEREL FISHING. The prospects of a crop of mackerel this season are very promising. The Yarmouth Register says that several fishermen from that vicinity, who were usually successful during the first part of the season, have recently returned with very small fares. Many of the most experienced fishermen are included in the number, who give as their opinion that the number of mackerel diminishes every year. The Gloucester Telegraph mentions that two vessels arrived a few days ago at that port, which had been absent over three weeks, without obtaining one barrel of mackerel!

MANNA. By a recent despatch from Van, in Turkish Armenia, an authenticated statement has been received at Constantinople of a copious fall of manna from heaven. Although manna was not reported to have fallen to the earth two inches deep, and to afford food many days to the people. Specimens were forwarded to the government, which the ports intend to have chemically analyzed. The following passage, translated from the Arabic, in the Malta Times, seems to be connected with this subject. "A great famine has happened in Aleppo, Malatia and Barbut, inasmuch that the people died with hunger, and sold their sons and daughters in great bread. But the Almighty God rained upon them seed and fed them with it. The words of the prophet of these few words, add, the Malta Times, 'extracted from an Arabic letter, we are perfectly misled.' The seed was manna, which fell in Malta, being nearly like fine sawdust, and when being kept a little while, became white, like snow (very fine wheaten flour).

MORMONS. The Trenton N. J. State Gazette states that the Mormons have two societies in Monmouth county, one at Burner's town and the other at Ton's place, both of them belonging to Mr. Farmer, and 70 or 80 in the latter. They have also meetings regularly, once a week, at New Egypt, besides occasional meetings at other places.

NEW YORK STATE CANALS. Under circumstances which we fear from preventing the return of the New York state canal promises to be this year quite as large, if not larger, than the warmest friends of internal improvements anticipated. Up to the 1st of this month they amount to $1,164,977, when last week they reached the sum of $1,716,370 11. And on the whole, it may be set down that the net revenue from this source will prove nearly double the estimate made by Mr. Verplanck. It has nearly upon the finances presented to the senate at the last session, which was assumed as exaggerated.

(N. Y. Cour. & Eng.)

SMALL NOTES. The attorney general of Pennsylvania has issued a circular to the judges, in which he directs them after the 10th of next month, September, to institute proceedings against all those who have issued and not redeemed, or small continue to issue or distribute, the estimate made by Mr. Verplanck. It has nearly upon the finances presented to the senate at the last session, which was assumed as exaggerated.

STEAMERS. The Acadia left Boston on the 13th with 50 passengers for Halifax, and 84 for Liverpool, 7,000 letters and the usual quantity of newspapers.—Donald McLeod esq. of Washington, went out in her with despatches to our minister in London. A package of despatches for our minister reached Boston three hours too late for the Acadia.

STEAMBOATS. Buffalo papers say that half a million of dollars worth of steamboat stock is now lying up at that place out of commission. The season of business on the lakes has been prodigiously overdone for two or three years past.

The St. Louis and St. Charles hotten boat drawing about ten inches water the timber, in which six weeks ago were growing in the forests, had made two trips from Pittsburgh to Beaver and one to Cincinnati, when on the 11th inst. the boiler burst, and the vessel, with four small boilers burst, and a Mr. Harring, a passenger, either fell or jumped overboard and was drowned.

The Green. The beautiful lake experimental steamer Green, commanded by Capt. Green, left New York on Saturday last. It is mentioned in the Argus that Capt. H. will probably take his Gorm through the Erie canal.

STEEL. The Acadia steamer, which left Boston on Monday last, took out over $100,000 in specie.

SAFETY BELTING is more actively carried on at present than any business in the country. The Baltimore are parading the ship Hope recently built at Duxbury as the most splendid piece of naval architecture ever entered the port of Boston, and probably the largest merchant ship, being accompanied by regular 353 tons. It is intended for the cotton trade and will carry 3,200 bbls. of cotton, and is to be commanded by Capt. Freeman Soule.

STOCKS. Within the last ten years $150,000,000 worth of stocks has been imported into this country.—Where are the stocks now? Where are they any thing to show for what we have paid? No.

We are now 150 millions of dollars poorer than we should have been had we not a duty on them as high as to prevent their importation. Let no one say that we need no duty, that the people must learn economy. If they are imported, the rich will have them, and the poor will be left with nothing but the duty, striving to save their more wealthy neighbors. The only remedy is to stop the supply. (Whiting Times.)

Tobacco. Two hogheads of tobacco, mis-entred, have been sold recently in Lynnhourg, Virginia, at $25 25 per 100 lbs.

The inspections in Baltimore last week consisted of 506 hogheads of which 606 were Maryland, 223 Ohio, 60 Virginia and 1 Kentucky. The demand fell off during the week; prices, Maryland inferior and common 61st 50c; middling to good 53rd 50c; good 55th 50c; and 56th 50c. Common Union middling 54th 50c; good 55th 50c; and 56th 50c. Extra 57th 50c; and extra 58th 50c.

WHEAT. declined during the last week in the Baltimore market from 81 25 to 81 24 for Maryland red.

Wool. The Forbesburgh Anglo quotes this article as in demand at 48 to 50 cents, cash, for first quality, and 30 to 40 for second.

The Boston Advertiser says, of the clip wool: "There is but little doing in our own market; we understand that there is a considerable extent have been made in Vermont by our manufacturers, at a distance, their below our range of quotations. Large purchases have also been made in the state of New York—about 60,000 lbs. of clip wool, and a large quantity in the region of White River, Hoonock and Duches county, at an average of about 41 cents per lb. for the best fleece, being 3 to 4 cents per lb. above the prices of last year—the wool, however, is considered 10 per cent. lighter and cleaner than last year."

The Michigan farmers are turning their attention to raising corn. They have recently taken 1,620 into California county—no state in the union is better adapted for the business.

WHALES. The ships Montezuma, of Philadelphia, and Peruvian, of Baltimore, have both been sold for whales.

The Delaware Republican says, The ship Ceres, captain Ayres, left her wharf this morning, and dropped anchor to wait for the Peruvian, in fine company. She will not sail on Saturday, upon a fine day, as the Pacific ocean still sports whale.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The Cunard steamer Columbia, captain Judkins, arrived at Boston on the 19th inst. in 154 days from Liverpool, bringing papers as late as the 4th from that place.

The owes brought by the Colombis is highly interesting and important; the intelligence taken out by the Britannia had created a great deal of alarm amongst the friends of peace; and at the stock exchange consols immediately fell, in consequence of the decision of the supreme court not to liberate McLeod.

The commercial owes is bad. Trade was indescribably dull in all the manufacturing districts. Cotton had declined $\frac{1}{4}$ per lb. Several heavy failures had taken place; a great many workmen were out of employ, and serious disturbances were apprehended unless relief should come from some quarter.

A complete list of the new parliament gives 292 liberals and 358 tories, making together 650. But this does not agree with other accounts—the Morning Post claims a tory gain of 82. But the Spectator shows a gain of 75 to the tories and 55 liberals, giving a balance of 40, and counting 50 on a division to the tories.

Daniel O'Connell is speechifying, keeping up his "burrah for repeal," and collecting subscriptions in Ireland.

The arrival of another overland mail from India with not the least owes from China, created great astonishment, and gave rise to many conjectures as to the reason of such an unusual occurrence.

Great alarm was felt at one time for the crops in Great Britain, which, it was supposed would be entirely destroyed by the continued hot weather; but recent accounts state that the crops now promise well in all quarters.

The Britannia steamer arrived out on 29th July, making the voyage from Boston, including that to Halifax, in 124 days, the shortest yet.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Sir Robert Peel gave a dinner on the 27th ult. at Tanworth, to his supporters, and made a long speech on the occasion. He declared that he intended to act upon the declarations which he made in 1835, and upon particular measures which he supported in 1840. He would not state positively whether he would do it called to the administration of affairs, but he intended to be in place in parliament, August 19th, personally to witness the result of the appeal which had been made to the people.

Lord John Russell, the day before his marriage, (July 19th) wrote an address to his London constituents, which appeared in the papers immediately after, and caused considerable talk. He says "as no minister of the crown can stand without the confidence of the house of commons, our retirement from office will immediately follow the condemnation of our policy."

Meeting of parliament. A general impression exists that parliament will meet for the despatch of business on the 19th (August), but that is by no means certain. The writs are returnable on that day, but the meeting of the legislature must be convened by proclamation, agreed upon by her majesty in council.

The new ministry. The following is given as a list of those to whom it is supposed will constitute the new ministry.

Sir Robert Peel, first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer.

Earl of Aberdeen, principal secretary of state for foreign affairs.

Lord Wharncliffe, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

H. Ho, Henry Goldwin, secretary of state for the home department.

Sir Wm. Follett, lord high chancellor.

Vol. X—Sto. 26.

Lord Stanley, secretary of state for the colonies.

Duke of Wellington, president of council.

Hon. C. Shaw Lefevre, speaker of the house of commons.

Sir H. Hardinge, secretary for Ireland.

Duke of Bedford, lord chamberlain.

Lord Liverpool, lord steward.

Earl of Jersey, master of horse.

Lord Lyndhurst, ambassador at Paris.

Markets. See American stocks in London, July 31.

—Maryland fives, 75; New York fives for 1855, 80; Ohio fives 87; Tennessee fives 75; United States bank 85.

Liverpool cotton markets, Monday, August 2.

The demand still continues very limited, and the prices of the ordinary and middling qualities of American have given very fully $\frac{1}{4}$ per lb.; all other descriptions too are dull, and have suffered a similar depression. The business of the week amounts to 20,220 bales, (of which 600 are American and 200 Surat to speculators, with 2,250 American and 200 Pernambuco for shipment) and comprises: See

Sea Island at 13d. to 21d.; 5,060 bowed 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 4,650 Mobile, Alabama and Tennessee at 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 7,250 Orleans 5 to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 470 Pernambuco, Parahiba, &c. 8 to 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 490 Bahia and Maricao 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 230 Maranhon 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 1,120 Peruvian 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 30 Carthagea 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; 570 Egyptian 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. and 2,150 Surat at 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb.

Tuesday, Aug. 3. The sales to-day are 1,200 bales.

Liverpool markets, Aug. 3. The tobacco market has been quiet, and the sales amount only to 30 bbls. at fair prices.

Our import that this week shows moderate supplies of British grain, flour and oatmeal; the receipts of American are also of trivial amount. Several cargoes of foreign wheat have arrived, which are for the present entered under bond.

A return of unfavorable weather since our last giving renewed activity to the demand for bonded wheat and flour, and has again to report considerable quantities in these articles at advanced rates. 28s. 6d. per barrel has been paid for best brands United States flour. Holders of free wheat and flour have also demanded 25s. to 31. per bushel, and 6d. to 1s. per barrel above our last quotations, with which, however, our millers and dealers have reluctantly complied. Canadian wheat flour has brought 37s. to 38s. per barrel. Quakers—American wheat 10s. a 10s. 4d.; Canadian 10s. 3d. a 10s. 6d.

FRANCE.

The papers announce the signature, by all the parties, of the treaty which closes the passage of the Daendels against the ships of war of all foreign powers. This was the last step remaining to complete the return of France from her isolated position among the great powers.

The census of the doors and windows was still in progress, and had caused in many places partial outbreaks of discontent, but no such violent proceedings as at Toulouse.

The anniversary of the three days was celebrated in Paris as usual, with great display and ceremony, but without disturbance of any kind. The weather was very fine.

The government had taken very decided measures with the refractory inhabitants of Toulouse. An extraordinary commissioner had been sent there, with two royal ordinances, one dissolving the national guard and the other the municipal council. Large bodies of troops were pointed in and about the city, and every symptom of disturbance was promptly and rigorously put down.

The king and royal family had gone to Fontainebleau.

It was reported that the finance minister, M. Humann, had resolved to meet the chambers without consulting the proposed loan.

The allies from Algiers were to the 26th of July. Marseilles and Montpellier were occupied by the French troops, and several partial engagements had taken place, but none of great importance.

FROM THE EAST.

The overland mail from India had arrived, but the advices from Madras were only to the 2nd of April—not so late by three weeks as we have had direct. There were, however, late dates from Calcutta, but the news was not interesting.

TURKEY, EGYPT, SYRIA, &c.

Constantinople, July 13. A Turkish steamer reached this place on the 9th, bringing despatches of a favorable nature from their post. His expedition against the Candia rebels may be considered as terminated. After defeating the insurgents in divers skirmishes and encounters, two provinces submitted at discretion; and the third, with the exception of the mountains of Skisau, has followed the example of its other neighbors.

The eastern question. The following protocol of the conference was signed on July the 20th, 1841, and is published by the Augsburg Gazette:

"As the difficulties in which his highness the sultan was involved, and which induced him to accept the aid and support of the four powers, are terminated; and as Mehemit has fulfilled the act of submission to the sultan, which the convention of July aimed at, so have the representatives of the powers, signers of that treaty, thought fit to recognize and consecrate the old usages of the Ottoman ports for preventing armed ships of war to enter the straits of the Daendels and Bosphorus. To give a constant and permanent sanction to this, and, at the same time, to give a mark of the harmony and unity which guide the intentions of the powers, it is agreed to guarantee this, and to get the sultan to invite France to join therein.

As this agreement is intended to give Europe a pledge of the unity of the four powers, the British foreign secretary has undertaken, in concert with the other plenipotentiaries, to communicate them to the French government, and to take part in the arrangements, by which the sultan declares his determination to uphold the said rule, the five powers on their side making known their resolution to respect it. [Signed] ESTERHAZY, PALMELOTT, NEUMANN, BULOW, BRUNOW.

Alexandria, July 16. Col. Napier is still here, and his mission appears to await the despatches of the porte.

Troops are now under orders for the Hadgas, the military occupation of which it has been found necessary to entrust to Mehemit Ali, every species of disorder and anarchy having resulted from the short period in which these countries have been under the direct domination of the porte.

Mehemit Ali has sent 8,000,000 of piastres to Constantinople—5,000,000 of which is on account of the tribute, and the rest is for presents to the sultan and others. The sultan was so much pleased that it was believed he would reduce the tribute.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

Trade of Great Britain with the United States and France. We extract the following valuable information from the London Times of April 10th, 1841, exhibiting at one glance, the effect produced by the policy which is maintained in England and France, as contrasted with the policy which the United States has ruinously pursued.

Imports and exports.

The interchange of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland with all countries, given in English money, according to a scale of official value settled in the year 1698:

Perhaps few of our readers were prepared to see that France, as we are shown by her returns, is already importing from England and her dependencies direct, to an amount exceeding $5,000,000 sterling, and the import or custom of France is larger considerably than here appears, inasmuch as under existing regulations all products not being of European growth or manufacture cannot be received into the French market direct, but are sent from this country to Belgium or Holland, and thence into France. The excess of the French exports to this country and her dependencies, compared with the imports, is in some degree accounted for by this cause.

In like manner, out of the exports of the United States to this country, a certain portion of the amount (between £100,000 and £200,000) represents not the products of the United States, but goods sent there; as, for example, the gum of Senegal or the annatto of Cayenne, which are dependencies of France, in order that they may afterward be imported by British vessels into England.

The excess in the amount of the general exports over the imports of this country shows, that we are a saving and a lending people; our merchants lend to the merchants of other countries, and individuals of acquired fortune invest in a portion of their capital in foreign stocks, or in the purchase of lands in our colonies.

In the general interchange of the U. States we see a condition of trade, comparing the amount of imports and exports, the opposite of our own. We see that they are a borrowing people, and that the extent of their purchasing our products is measured by the degree of our lending the capital by which they are to be paid for. We say this in no invidious spirit, because we are among those who are of opinion that the bond of any salient community is as good and convenient a return for our industry as commodities in the ordinary sense; only, we speak of it as a fact, attested by all reasonable observation, and by such returns as are here before us, that when this country is in a spirit to invest in American securities, then it is that America is an unusually active customer for British goods.

In the general interchange of France, we see a steadily increasing trade, and that a remarkable equality obtains throughout, if the exports be compared with the imports. It may be stated incidentally, with regard to French commerce, that about one-third of the amount of imports, and about one-fourth of the amount of exports, are transported by land.

We cannot close this subject without subjoining one more table, for the purpose of exhibiting from our own custom house returns, the progress of that portion of the exports to France and to the United States, consisting only of British and Irish produce and manufactures, which by declared value, was as follows, viz:

	To France.	To the United States.
1835	$1,453,686	$1,049,456
" 1836	1,501,281	12,425,605
" 1837	1,643,204	4,695,225
" 1838	2,814,141	7,583,760
" 1839	2,299,307	8,538,304

As the exports from Great Britain to the United States extend little or nothing beyond our own produce and manufactures, it is at first sight not easy to reconcile what we return as the amount of our exports to the United States with what the United States government returns as the amount of their exports from this country. Among the causes which seem to explain the excess of the United States return, one is, that the freight of the goods is only earned and added to their value after arrival, and the other, that all the imports into the U. States south of New York, will for the last two or three years have been estimated, we might perhaps add, paid for, in depreciated money. Still explain it as we will, the irregularity of the United States, as a country, is evident. The same remarks, if the sum is large, but occasional disorder is one of the conditions under which we enjoy it.

INDIAN FRONTIER AFFAIRS. The Fayetteville (Arkansas) Witness says:—"It appears that upon the 4th of July, on account of its being a national day, a number of the soldiers of the garrison were allowed the privilege of visiting the village of Maysville, a short distance from the fort. Whilst there, having indulged first freely in the cups, as it is a soldier's wont, a riot took place, in which several of the soldiers and some Indians from the Cherokee nation took part, the consequence of which was, that one of the Indians met his death and another was badly wounded. The soldiers concerned in this affray were immediately placed in the guard-house, and efforts were made to ascertain which of them it was who committed the murder, but without success. Meanwhile, the friends of the deceased Indian became impatient at the delay, and collecting some six or seven hundred warriors, set themselves down before the fort, threatening to burn it and massacre the garrison, unless the persons concerned were instantly given up for punishment. This, of course, the commandant of the fort refused to do, and it was with the greatest difficulty that a number of the chief men of the nation could prevail upon the multitude to desist for a time from violence."

The brevet second lieutenants of dragoons will report for temporary duty and instruction to the commanding officer at Carlisle barracks; the brevet artilleers to the artillery will join the light companies to which they are temporarily assigned for duty; those engaged to the infantry, if not otherwise specially instructed, will report in person to the commanding officer at Fort Columbus.

The usual leave of absence allowed by the regulations is hereby granted to the several graduates; at the expiration of which (September 30) they will join their proper stations and regiments as herein directed.

VI.—Acceptances or non-acceptances of appointments will be reported to the adjutant general of the army; and, in case of acceptance, the birth places of the persons appointed will be stated.

Announced to the army by command of major general Scott:

Assistant adjutant general.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY, OF KENTUCKY, ON THE EXECUTIVE MESSAGE CONTAINING THE PRESIDENT'S OBJECTION TO THE BANK BILL.

In Senate, United States, August 19, 1841.

MR. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose and addressed the senate as follows: Mr. President, the bill which forms the present subject of our deliberations had passed both houses of congress by decisive majorities, and, in conformity with the requirement of the constitution, was presented to the president of the United States for his consideration. He has returned it to the senate, in which it originated, according to the direction of the constitution, with a message announcing his veto of the bill, and containing his objections to its passage. And the question now to be decided is, shall the bill pass, by the requisite constitutional majority of two-thirds, the president's objections notwithstanding.

Knowing, sir, but too well that no such majority can be obtained, and that the bill must fail, I would have been rejoiced to have found myself at liberty to abstain from saying one word on this painful occasion. But the president has not allowed me to give a silent vote. I think, with all respect and deference to him, he has not reciprocated the friendly spirit of concession and compromise which animated congress to the provisions of this bill, and especially in the modification of the sixteenth fundamental condition of the bank. He has commented,

I think, with undesigned severity on that part of the bill he has used, I am sure unintentionally, harsh. If not reproachful, language; and he has made the very concession, which was prompted as a peace offering, and from friendly considerations, the cause of stronger and more decided disapprobation of the bill. Standing in the relation to that bill which I do, and especially to the acceptable clause, the duty which I owe to the senate and to the country, and self-respect, impose upon me the obligation of at least attempting the vindication of a measure which has met with a fate so unwarmed and so unexpected.

On the 4th of April last the lamented Harrison, the president of the United States, paid the debt of nature. President Tyler, who, since the president, succeeded to the duties of that office, arrived to the city of Washington on the 6th of that month. He found the whole metropolis wrapped in gloom, every heart filled with sorrow and sadness, every eye streaming with tears, and the surrounding hills yet in the echo of the wailing dirges which the people tolled on that melancholy occasion. On entering the presidential mansion he contemplated the pale body of his predecessor stretched before him, and clothed in the black habiliments of death. At such a solemn moment I have no doubt that the heart of President Tyler was overflowing with mingled emotions of grief, of patriotism, and of gratitude—above all, of gratitude to that country by a majority of whose citizens he was elected president on the 6th of November, he then stood the most distinguished, the most elevated, the most honored of all living whigs of the United States.

It was under these circumstances, and in this probable mood of mind, that president Tyler, on the 10th day of the same month of April, voluntarily promulgated an address to the people of the United States. That address was in the nature of a coronation oath, which the chief of the state in other solemn moments have so often and so solemnly, upon ascending the throne. It referred to the solemn obligations, and the profound sense of duty, under which the new president entered upon the high trust which had devolved upon him, by the joint action of the people and of Providence, and it stated the principles and delineated the policy by which he would be governed in his exalted station. It was emphatically a whig address, from beginning to end—every inch of it was whig, and was patriotic.

In that address the president, in respect to the subject matter embraced in the present bill, held the following concise and emphatic language: "I shall promptly give my sanction to any constitutional measure which, originating in Congress, shall have for its object the restoration of a sound circulating medium, so essentially necessary to give confidence in all the transactions of life, to secure the interests of justice and adequate security, and to re-establish the true principle." In deciding upon the adaptation of any such measure to the end proposed, as well as its conformity to the constitution, I shall resort to the fathers of the great republican school for advice and instruction, to be drawn from their sage views of our system of government, and the light of their ever glorious example."

To this clause in the address of the president, I believe, but one interpretation was given throughout the whole country, by friend and foe, by whig and democrat, and by the presses of both parties. It was, by every man with whom I conversed on the subject at the time of its appearance, or of whom I have since inquired, construed to mean that the president intended to occupy the same high ground, and to regard the question of the power to establish a national bank as immovably settled. And I think I may confidently appeal to the senate and to the country, to sustain the fact that this was the contemporaneous and unanimous judgment of the public. Reverting back to the period of the promulgation of the address, could any other construction have been given to its language? What is it? "I shall promptly give my sanction to any constitutional measure which, originating in congress, shall have certain defined objects in view." He concedes the vital importance of a sound circulating medium to industry and to the public prosperity. He concedes that its origin must be in congress, and he prevents any inference from the qualification, which he prefixes to the measure, being interpreted to mean that a United States bank was unconstitutional, he declares that in deciding upon the adaptation of the measure to the end proposed, and its conformity to the constitution, he will resort to the fathers of the great republican school. And who were they? If the father of his country is to be excluded, are Madison, (the father of the constitution,) Jefferson, Monroe, Gerry, Gallatin, and the long list of republicans who associated with them, not to be regarded as among those fathers? But president Tyler declares not only that he should appeal to them for advice and instruction, but to the light of their ever glorious EXAMPLE. What example? What other meaning could have been possibly applied to the phrase, than that he intended to refer to what had been done by the illustrious Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe?

Entertaining this opinion of the address, I came to Washington at the commencement of the session, with the most confident and buoyant hopes that the whigs would be able to carry all their proposed measures, and especially the bank of the United States, by far that one of the greatest immediate importance. I anticipated nothing but cordial cooperation between the two departments of government; and I was not disappointed. I was soon to find, at the head of the executive branch, a personal and political friend, whom I had long and intimately known, and highly esteemed. It will not be my fault if our amicable relations should unhappily cease, in consequence of a difference of opinion between us on this occasion. The president has been always perfectly familiar with my opinion on this bank question.

Upon the opening of the session, but especially on the re-reading of a national bank, as proposed by the secretary of the treasury, fears were excited that the president had been misunderstood in his address, and that he had not valued but adhered to his constitutional scruples. Under these circumstances, it was with pleasure that the adoption of a mutual spirit of compromise and concession, a bank, competent to fulfill the expectations and satisfy the wants of the people, might be established.

Under the influence of that spirit, the senate and the house of representatives, to the great rejoicing of all, I confess, sir, that there was something exceedingly odious and revolting to my ears in the term "fiscal bank;" but I thought, "What is there in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." Looking, therefore, rather to the utility of the substantial facilities than to the name of the contemplated institution, we consented to that which was proposed.

As to the place of location of the bank. Although Washington was passed through my mind as among the cities in which it might be expedient to place the bank, it was believed to have the least eligible of some four or five other cities. Nevertheless, we consented to fix there.

And, finally, as to the branching power, there was not probably a solitary vote given in either house of congress for the bill that did not greatly prefer the unqualified branching power, as asserted in the address of the president, to the limitation of the United States, to the 16th fundamental condition as finally incorporated in this bill. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that it was not in conformity with the opinion and wish of majorities in congress, but in a friendly spirit of compromise, that the president and his particular friends, that the clause assumed that form. So repugnant was it to some of the best friends of a national bank in the other house, that they finally voted against the bill because it contained that compromise of the branching power.

It is true, that, in presenting the compromise to the senate, I stated, as was the fact, that I did not know whether it would be acceptable to the president or not; that, according to my opinion, each department of the government should act upon its own responsibility, independently of the other; and that I presented the modification of the branching power because it was necessary to ensure the passage of the bill, and to occupy the same high ground, and to regard the question of the power to establish a national bank as immovably settled. But I nevertheless did entertain the most confident hopes and expectations that the bill would receive the sanction of the president; and this motive, although not the immediate one, had great weight in the introduction and adoption of the compromise clause. I knew that our friends who would not vote for the bill as reported were actuated, they avowed, by considerations of union and compromise, and of expediency. The views of the president, and I presumed that he would not fail to feel and appreciate their sacrifices. But I deeply regret that we were mistaken. Notwithstanding all our conciliatory, kind, and sincere spirit of conciliation, and the sanction of the president could not be obtained, and the bill has been returned by him with his objections.

I shall now proceed to consider those objections, with as much brevity as possible, but with the most perfect respect to official and personal, towards the chief magistracy.

After stating that the power of congress to establish a national bank, to operate per se, has been a controversial question, and the origin of the government, the president remarks: "Men most justly and deservingly esteemed for their high intellectual endowments, their virtue and their patriotism, have, in regard to it, entertained different and conflicting opinions. Congress has differed. The approval of one president has been followed by the disapproval of another."

From this statement of the case it may be inferred that the president considers the weight of sympathy, pro and con, to be equal and balanced.—But if he intended to make such an array of it—it he intended to say that he was equally divided—most respectfully, but most decidedly, dissent from him. I think the conjoint testimony of history, tradition, and the knowledge of living witnesses prove the contrary. How stands the question as to the opinion of Congress? In the congress of 1791, the congress of 1813-14, the congress of 1815-16, the congress of 1831-32, and, finally, the present congress, have all respectively and unequivocally affirmed the existence of a power in congress to establish a national bank to operate pro et contra. We be hold, then, the concurrent opinion of five different congresses on one side. And what congress is there on the opposite side? The congress of 1811? I was a member of the senate in that year, when it decided, by the count of yeas and nays, in opposition against the renewal of the charter of the old bank of the United States. And I now here, in my place, add to the testimony already before the public, by declaring that it is within my certain knowledge, that that decision of the senate did not proceed from a disbelief of a majority of the senate in the power of congress to establish a national bank, but from combined considerations of expediency and constitutionality. A majority of the senate, on the contrary, as I know, considered the object as to the power of congress. Thus the account, as to congress, stands five for and not one, or, at most, not more than one, against the power.

Let us now look into the state of authority derivable from the opinions of presidents of the United States. President Washington believed in the power of congress, and approved a bank bill. President Jefferson approved acts to extend branches into other parts of the country, and to purchase the confiscated notes of the bank—acts which were devoid of all justification whatever upon the assumption of the unconstitutionality of the bank. For how could branches be extended or punishment be lawfully inflicted upon the members of the legislature of a corporation which came into existence without any authority, and in violation of the constitution of the land? James Madison, notwithstanding those early scruples which he had entertained, and which he afterwards so frequently mentioned and signed a bill to charter the late Bank of the United States. It is perfectly well known that Mr. Monroe never did entertain any scruples or doubts in regard to the power of congress. Here, then, are four presidents of the United States who have directly or collaterally borne official testimony to the existence of the bank power in congress.—And what president is there that ever bore unequivocally opposite testimony—that disapproved a bank charter in the acute intensity of the debate? George Jackson, although he did apply the veto power to the bill for re-chartering the late Bank of the United States in 1832, it is within the perfect recollection of us all that he not only testified to the utility of a bank of the United States, but declared that, if he had been applied to by congress, he could have furnished the plan of such a bank.

Thus, Mr. President, we perceive that, in reviewing the action of the legislative and executive departments of our government, there was vast preponderance of the weight of authority maintaining the existence of the power in congress. But president Tyler has, I presume, unintentionally, wholly omitted to notice the judicial department of the government upon this controverted question—that department, whose interpretations of the constitution, within its proper jurisdiction and sphere of action, are binding upon all, and which, therefore, may be considered as exercising a controlling power over both the other departments. The supreme court of the U. States, with its late chief justice, the illustrious Marshall, at its head, unanimously decided that congress possessed the power to charter a bank of the United States, without any dissenting all afterwards the question arose before the court.

After recounting the occasion, during his public career, on which he had expressed an opinion against the power of congress to charter a bank of the United States, the president proceeds to say:—"Entertaining the opinions alluded to, and having taken this oath, the senate and the country will see that I could not give my sanction to a measure of the character described." Without any dissenting all claim to the respect of honorable men—all confidence on the part of the people—all self-respect—all regard for moral and religious obligations; without an observance of which an government can be prosperous, and no people can be happy. It would be to commit a crime which I would not willingly commit to gain any earthly reward, and which would reflect upon me to the ridicule and scorn of all virtuous men."

Mr. President, I must think, and hope I may be allowed to say, with profound deference to the chief magistrate, that it appeared to me he was viewing with too lively sensibility the personal consequences to himself of his approval of the bill; and that, surrendering himself to a vivid imagination, he has depicted them in much too glowing and exaggerated colors, and that it would have been most unjust if the cool reasoner had depicted more the consequences of a veto upon the hopes, the interests and the happiness of his country. Does it follow that a magistrate who yields his private judgment to the concurring authority of numerous decisions, repeatedly and deliberately announced, after the lapse of long intervals, by all the departments of government, and by all parties, incurs the dreadful penalties described by the president? Can any man be disgraced and dishonored who yields his private judgment to the endorsement of the government in such a case, the country, (I mean a majority), congress, and, according to common fame, an unanimous cabinet, were all united in favor of the bill. Should any man feel himself humbled, and degraded in yielding to the conjoint force of such official authority? Does any man, who at one period of his life has already expressed a particular opinion, and at a subsequent period still act upon the opposite opinion, expose himself to the ridicule of posterity? Is the man betrayed by the president? How is it with the judge, in the case by no means rare, who bows to the authority of repeated precedents, settling a particular question, whilst in his private opinion he is of the opposite opinion? Is it with that numerous class of public men in this country, and with the two great parties that have divided it, who, at different periods, have maintained and acted on opposite opinions in respect to this very bank question?

How is it with James Madison, the father of the constitution—that great man whose services to his country placed him only second to Washington—whose virtues and purity in private life—whose respect for the rights of the citizen—whose character stand unsurpassed? He was a member of the national convention that formed, and of the Virginia convention that adopted, the constitution. No man understood it better than he did. It was opposed to him, and he established the bank of the United States upon constitutional ground; and in 1816 he approved and signed the charter of the late Bank of the United States. It is a part of the secret history connected with that bank, that James Madison acted, at the instance of George Jackson, as a veto for him in the contingency of his rejection of the bill. Thus stood James Madison when, in 1835, he applied the veto to a bill to charter a bank upon considerations of expediency, but with a clear and express admission of the existence of a constitutional power of congress to charter one. In 1816, the bill which was then presented to him being free from the objections applicable to that of the previous year, he sanctioned and signed it. Did James Madison surrender all confidence on the part of the people—all self-respect—all regard for moral and religious obligations? Did not the president, in the gift of that sanction, by his sanction and signature to the charter of the late Bank of the United States, commit a crime which justly subjected him "to the ridicule and scorn of all virtuous men?"

Not only did the president, as it respectfully appears to me, state entirely too strongly the consequences of his approval of the bill, but he has perfectly erred in treating the question, (as he seems to me to have done), which he was called upon to decide, as presenting the sole alternative of his direct approval or rejection of the bill? Was the preservation of the consistency and the conscience of the president wholly irreconcilable with the restoration of the blessings of a sound currency, regular and unobscured prices, and the revival of confidence and business which congress believes will be secured by a national bank? Was there no alternative but to prolong the sufferings of a bleeding country, or to send on this wretched and mischievous bill to the executive department of the government, during the last twelve years, has sprung most of the public ills which have afflicted the people. Was it necessary that the source of suffering and of evil should be perpetuated, in order to preserve the consistency of the president unviolated? Was that the only sad and deplorable alternative? I think, Mr. President, there were other alternatives worthy of the serious and patriotic consideration of the president. The bill might have become a law, in virtue of the provision which required its return within ten days. If the president had retained it three days longer, it would have been a law, without his sanction and without his signature. In the contingency, the president would have remained passive, and would not have been liable to any accusation of having himself violated the constitution. All that could have been justly said would be, that he did not choose to give his name to a bill that was an obstacle to the passage of a measure indispensable to the prosperity of the nation, in the judgment of the party which brought him into power, of the whig congress which his first met, and, if public fame says truly, of the great majority of the people. Had Harrison called around him; and which he voluntarily continued. In an analogous case, Thomas McKean, when governor of Pennsylvania, then when the United States have produced but few men of equal vigor of mind and soundness of purpose, permitted a bill to become a law, although, in his opinion, it was contrary to the constitution of that state. And I have heard, and, from the creditable nature of the source, I am inclined to believe, although I will not venture for the fact, that in the close of the charter of first bank of the United States during the second term of Mr. Jefferson, some consideration of the question of the renewal of the charter was entertained, and that the expressed wish that, if the charter were renewed, it might be affected by the operation of the ten days' provision, and his consistency thus preserved.

If it were possible to disinter the venerated remains of James Madison, reanimate his perishing form, and place it before him in the halls of this state, which he so much admired, what would have been his course, if this bill had been presented to him, even supposing him never to have announced his acquiescence in the settled judgment of the nation? He would have said, that human contrivance in regard to a single question should not be perpetual, and ought to have a termination. Thus, about the power to establish a bank of the United States, his mind was divided, and he was torn, as it were, under all the forms of its public action, has often and deliberately decided it. A bank, and associated financial and currency questions, which long slept, were revived and have divided the nation into two parties, and have been the center of struggle; and the party which put down the bank, and which occasioned all the disorders in our currency and finances, has itself been signally put down, by one of those great moral and political revolutions which are the scourges of the world, and seldom assume itself to make. Human infirmity has not been granted by God; and the chances of error are much greater on the side of one man than on that of the majority of a whole people and their successive rulers during a long period of time. I yield to the irresistible force of authority. I will not put myself in opposition to a measure so imperatively demanded by the public voice and so essentially to elevate my depressed and suffering countrymen.

And why should not president Tyler have suffered the bill to become a law without his signature? Without meaning the slightest possible disrespect to him, (nothing is further from my mind than the exhibition of any such feeling towards that distinguished citizen, long my personal friend), it cannot be forgotten that he came into his present office under peculiar circumstances. The people did not vote for the continuance of his administration. They voted for him as vice president. They did not, therefore, scrutinize his opinions with the care which they probably ought to have done, and would have done, if they could have looked into futurity. If the present state of the fact could have been anticipated—if at Harrisburg, or at the polls, it had been foreseen that general Harrison would die in one short month after the commencement of his administration; that vice president Tyler would be elevated to the presidency during a long period of time by decisive majorities of the first whig congress, chartering a national bank, would be presented for his sanction; and that he would veto the bill, do I hazard any thing when I express the conviction that he would not have received a solitary vote in the nominating convention, nor any solitary electoral vote in any state in the union?

Should I believe that the honor, the firmness, the independence, the clearness of vision which he has drawn in question if he had remained passive, and so permitted the bill to become a law? I answer that the office of chief magistrate is a sacred and exalted trust, created and conferred for the benefit of the nation, and not for the private advantage of the person who fills it. Can any man's reputation for firmness, independence and honor be of more importance than the welfare of a great people? There is nothing, in my humble judgment, in such a course, incompatible with honor, with firmness, with independence properly understood. Certainly, I must respectfully think, in reference to a measure like this, recommended by such high sanctions—by five congresses—by the adoption of four precedents—by repeated decisions of the supreme court—by the acquiescence and judgment of the people of the U. States during long periods of time—by its salutary operation on the interests of the community for a space of forty years, and deemed by the people whose suffrages placed president Tyler in that second office from whence he was translated to the first, that he might have suppressed the promptings of all personal pride of private opinion, if any arose in his bosom, and yielded to the wishes and wants of his country. Nor do I believe that, in such a course, he would have made the smallest sacrifice, in a just sense, of personal honor, firmness or independence.

But, sir, there was still a third alternative, to which I allude not because I mean to intimate that it should be embraced, but because I am reminded of it by a memorable event in the life of president Tyler. It will be recollected that, after the senate had passed the resolution of abolishing the single public deposits from the late bank of the U. States to have derogatory from the constitution and laws of the United States, for which resolution president then senator Tyler, had voted, the general assembly of Virginia, to which he was elected from that state to vote for the expunging of that resolution. Senator Tyler declined voting in conformity with that instruction, and resigned his seat in the senate of the United States. This he did because he could not conform, and did think it right to go counter, to the wishes of those who had placed him in the senate. If, when the people of Virginia, or the general assembly of Virginia were his only constituency, he would not set up his own particular opinion in opposition to that which ought to be the rule of his conduct when the people of 26 states—a whole nation—compose his constituency? Is the will of the constituency of one state to be respected, and that of twenty-six to be wholly disregarded? Is obedience to the single state of Virginia? The president admits that the bank question deeply agitated and continues to agitate the nation. It is inconsistent that, in all our recent, absorbing and controlling question, in all our recent divisions and dissensions, he should be convinced, and it is my deliberate judgment, that an immense majority, not less than two-thirds of the nation, desire such an institution. All doubts on this respect ought to be dispelled by the recent decisions of the two houses of congress. I speak of their assent of popular opinion. In the house of representatives the majority was 181 to 150. If the house had been full, and but for the modification of the 18th fundamental condition, there would have been a probable majority of 200. It is to be believed that this large majority of the immediate representatives of the people, fresh from amongst them, and to whom the president seemed inclined, in his opening message, to refer this very question, have mistaken the wishes of their constituents.

I pass the sixteenth fundamental condition, in respect to the branching power, on which I regret to feel myself obliged to say that I think the president has commented with an unexampled severity, and with a harshness of language, and a want of the maintenance of that friendly and harmonious intercourse which is so desirable between co-ordinate departments of the government. The president does not have been restrained that every one of the twenty-six senators, and nearly every one of the hundred and thirty-one representatives who voted for the bill, if left to his own separate wishes, would have preferred the branching power to have been conferred unconditionally, as it was in the charters of the two former banks of the United States, in consenting to the restrictions upon the exercise of that power, he must have been perfectly aware that they were actuated by a friendly spirit of compromise and concession. Yet nowhere in his message does he reciprocate or return in any manner. Speaking of the assent or dissent which the clause requires, he says: "This iron rule is to give way in circumstances—it is unbending and inflexible. It is the language of the master to the vassal. An unconditional assent is claimed forfeited." The "high privilege" of a submission of the question, on the part of the state representatives, to their constituents, according to the message, is denied. He puts the cause of the resolution in the hands of the legislature expressing its dissent by a unanimous vote, and its resolution may be defeated by a tie vote in the senate, and "both branches of the legislature yet the governor may exert the veto power conferred on him by the state constitution, and their legislative action be defeated." "The state may afterwards protest against such unjust inference, but its authority is gone." The president continues: "To interferences so violent, and as they seem to me irrational, I cannot yield my assent. No exert of justice would or could sanction them, without reversing all that is established in judicial proceeding, by introducing presumptions at variance with fact, and inferences at the expense of reason. A state in a condition of distress would be presumed to speak as an individual, nation and not as a principle, might be presumed to be in the enjoyment of freedom. Far better to say to the states, boldly and frankly, congress wills, and submission is demanded." Now, Mr. President, I will not ask whether these animadversions were provoked by a reciprocal spirit of animosity and kindness, but I inquire whether all of them are perfectly just.

Beyond all question, those who believed in the constitutional right of congress to exercise the branching power within the states, unconditionally and without limitation, did make no small concession when they consented that it should be subjected to the restrictions specified in the compromise clause. They did not, it is true, concede every thing to the advocates of the absolute right, but to establish branches without the authority of the states during the whole period of the existence of the charter; but they did agree that reasonable time should be allowed to the several states to determine whether they would or would not consent to the establishment of branches within their respective limits. They did not think it right to leave it an open question, for the space of twenty years; nor that a state should be permitted to grant to-day the veto to-morrow its assent, and not to-day annex onerous or impracticable conditions to its assent, but that it should definitely decide the question, after the lapse of ample time for full deliberation. And what was that time? No state would have had less time than four months, and some of them from five to nine months for consideration. Was it, therefore, entirely correct for the president to say that an "unconditional assent is claimed forfeited," forthwith means immediately, instantly, without delay, which amounts to a denial of a space of time varying from four to nine months. And the president supposes that the "high privilege" of the members of the state legislature submitting the question to their constituents is denied? How could it be denied at any time during that space have consulted their constituents?

The president proceeds to say that I must, with the greatest deference and respect, consider as extreme cases. He supposes the popular branch to express its dissent by a unanimous vote, and that it is overruled by a tie in the senate. He supposes that "both branches of the legislature may concur in a resolution of decided dissent, and yet the governor may exert the veto power." The unfortunate case thereof is a case which no legislator will be so checked by executive authority, would not be worse than that of the union, the will of whose legislature, in establishing this bank, is checked and controlled by the president.

But did it not occur to him that extreme cases brought forward on the one side, might be met by the extreme cases suggested on the other? Suppose the popular branch were to express its assent to the establishment of a branch bank by a unanimous vote, and yet the legislature by a tie vote in the senate, or suppose that both branches of the legislature, by majorities in each, exactly equal to one vote to make two-thirds, were to concur in a resolution involving the introduction of a branch within the limits of the state, and the governor were to exercise his veto power, and defeat the resolution. Would it be very unreasonable in these two cases to infer the assent of the state to the establishment of a branch?

Extreme cases should never be resorted to. Happily, in the present case, the affairs are not so badly affected or influenced by them, in consequence of the rarity of their occurrence.

The plain, simple, unvarnished statement of the case is this: congress believe itself invested with the constitutional power to authorize, unconditionally, the establishment of a bank in the United States, and asking any other consent of the states than that the president does not concur in the existence of that power, and was supposed to intend that the previous assent of the states was necessary. Here was an unfortunate conflict of opinion. Here if the difference could be reconciled, Congress would have far towards a compromise, and the states to express their assent or dissent, but then it thought that this should be done without some limited, but reasonable, time; and it believed, since the bank and its branches were established for the benefit of twenty-six states, if the authorities of any one of them really could not make up their mind within that limited time either to assent or dissent to the introduction of a branch, that it was not unreasonable, after the lapse of the appointed time without any positive action, one way or the other, on the part of the state, to proceed as if it had assented. Now, if the power contended for by congress really exists, it must be admitted that there was a concession, or a concession according to which an unconditional power is placed under temporary restrictions—a privilege offered to the states which was not extended to them; by either of the charters of the two former banks of the United States. I am totally at a loss to comprehend how the president reached the conclusion that it would have been "far better to say to the states, boldly and frankly, congress wills, and submission is demanded." Was it better for the states that the power of branching should be exerted without consulting them at all? Was it nothing to afford them an opportunity of saying whether they desired branches or not? How can it be believed that a clause which qualifies, restricts, and limits the branching power, is more derogatory from the sovereignty of the states, than the reign of the states, than if it inexpressly refused to the states any power whatever to deliberate and decide on the introduction of branches? Limited as the time was, and unconditionally as they were invited to express their dissent, by either of the last proviso, overrule its law, and upon grounds which, to such state, will appear to rest on a constructive necessity and propriety, and nothing more.

Even if the dissent of a state should be overruled, in the manner supposed by the president, how is the condition of that state worse than it would have been if the branching power had been absolutely and unconditionally asserted in the charter? There would have been the dissent of a state, it is conceded, with a high degree of probability that if the dissent were expressed no branch would be introduced.

The last proviso to which the president refers is in these words: "And provided, nevertheless, that whenever it shall become necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers granted by the constitution, to establish an office or offices in any of the states, and the establishment thereof shall be deemed to be necessary, the majority of the said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

This proviso was intended to reserve a power to congress to compel the bank to establish branches, if the establishment of them should be necessary to the great purposes of this government, notwithstanding the dissent of a state. If, for example, a state had once unconditionally assented to the establishment of a branch, and afterwards assented, the bank could not have been compelled, without this reservation of power, to establish the branch, however urgent the necessity might be.

The president, I think, ought to be reminded of the form and substance of the proviso, the spirit of conciliation in which it was drawn, as I know. It does not assert the power; it employs "the language of the constitution itself, leaving every one free to interpret the language according to his own sense of the instrument."

Why was it deemed necessary to speak of its being "the language of the master to the vassal" of "this iron rule," that "congress wills and submission is demanded." What is this whole federal government but a mass of powers abstracted from the sovereignty of the several states, and wielded by an organized government for their common benefit and general welfare, according to the grants supreme; the constitution is the acts of congress, and the constitution. Whenever, therefore, this government acts within the powers granted to it by the constitution, submission and obedience are due from all; from states, from individuals, from persons. And if this submission and congressional domination, if the constitution, created or consented to by the states, that act in accordance with the powers granted, the contingency supposed, that an act of congress has repealed an act of state legislation. Undoubtedly in case of a conflict between the state constitution or state law, and the constitution of the United States or an act of congress passed in pursuance of it, the state constitution or state law would yield. But it could not at least be formally or technically said that the state constitution or law was repealed. Its operation would be suspended or abrogated by the necessary predominance of the paramount authority.

The president seems to have regarded as objectionable that provision in the clause which declares that a branch, once established, it should not afterwards be withdrawn without the sanction of the previous congress. That provision was intended to operate both upon the bank and the states. And, considering the changes and fluctuations in public sentiment in some of the states within the last few years, was the security against them to be found in that provision unreasonable? One legislature might invite a branch, which the next might attempt, by penal or other legislation, to drive away. We have had such examples heretofore, and I cannot think that we are to be wiser by experience. Besides, an exactly similar provision was contained in the scheme of a bank which was reported by the secretary of the treasury, and to which it was understood the president had given his assent. But I understand that, when that scheme could not have obtained his sanction, if congress had passed it without any alteration whatever. It authorized what is termed by the president local discounts, and he does not believe the constitution confers upon congress the right to limit a bank having that faculty. He says, indeed, "I regard the bill as asserting for congress the right to incorporate a United States bank, with power and right to establish offices of discount and deposit in the several states of this union, with or without their consent; a privilege to which I have always heretofore been opposed, and which can never obtain my sanction." I pass with pleasure from this painful theme; deeply regretting that I have been constrained so long to dwell on it.

At a former occasion I stated that, in the event of an unfortunate difference of opinion between the legislative and executive departments, the point of difference might be developed, and it would be then seen whether they could be brought into coincidence by any measure corresponding with the public hopes and expectations. I regret that the president has not, in this message, favored us with a more clear and explicit exhibition of his views. It is sufficiently manifest that he is in favor of the establishment of a new bank of the United States formed after the two old models. I think it is fairly to be inferred that the plan of the secretary of the treasury could not have received his sanction. He is opposed to the passage of the bill which he has returned; but whether he would give his approbation to any bank, and, if any, what sort of a bank, is not absolutely clear. I think it may be collected from the message, with the aid of information derived through other sources, that the president would concur in the establishment of a bank whose operations should be limited to dealing in bills of exchange, to deposits and to the supply of a circulation, exceeding the power of discounting promissory notes. And I understand that some of our friends are now considering the practicability of arranging and passing a bill in conformity with the views of president a year.

It is not a safe policy to take no active part in such an experiment, and must reserve to myself the right of determining whether I can or cannot vote on such a bill after I see it in its mature form. I am not a candidate for any office, and I shall find no objection to my speaking in me. On the contrary, I say to them, go on: God speed you in any measure which will serve the country, and preserve our harmony and concert between the departments of government. An executive veto of a bank of the United States, after the sad experience of the late veto, is an event which was not anticipated by the political friends of the president; certainly not by me. But it has come upon us with tremendous weight, and amidst the greatest excitement within and without the metropolis. The question now is, what shall be done? What of this most embarrassing and unexpected state of things, what our constituents expect of us? What is required by the duty and the dignity of the executive? I repeat that it, after all, is a question which will afford any remedy to existing evils, and secure the president's approbation, let the project of such a bank be presented. It shall encounter no opposition, if it should receive no support from me.

But what further shall we do? Never, since I have enjoyed the honor of participating in the public councils of the nation—a period now of nearly thirty-five years—have I met congress under more bappy or more favorable auspices. Never have I seen a house of representatives animated by more patriotic dispositions—more united, more determined, more business-like. Not even that house which declared war in 1812; nor that which, in 1815-16, laid broad and deep foundations of national prosperity, in adequate provisions for a sound currency, by the establishment of a bank of the United States for the payment of the national debt, and for the protection of American industry. This house has solved the problem of the competency of a large deliberative body to transact the public business. It has firmly there established a sentiment of opinion and cordial co-operation between the different departments of the government, and all the members of the party, we should have carried every measure contemplated at the extra session, which the people had a right to expect from our plodgers, and should have been, by this time, at our respective homes. We are disappointed in one, and an important one, of that series of measures; but shall we therefore despair? Shall we abandon ourselves to unworthy feelings and sentiments? Shall we allow ourselves to be transported by rash and intemperate passions and counsels? Shall we adjourn and go home in disgust? No! No! No! A higher, nobler and more patriotic career lies before us. Let us do our duty, that of Representatives of the people, our whole duty, and nothing short of our duty, towards our common country. We have repelled the sub-treasury. We have passed a bankrupt law: a beneficial measure of substantial and permanent relief. Let us now proceed to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands; the revenue bill, and the bill for the benefit of the oppressed people of this District. Let us do all—let us give every thing we can for the public good. If we finally be disappointed in our hopes of giving to the country a bank which will once more supply it with a sound currency, still let us go home and tell our constituents that we did all that we could under actual circumstances; and that, if we finally give every measure of relief, it was only because to do so was possible. If nothing can be done at this extra session to put upon a more stable and satisfactory basis the currency and exchanges of the country, let us hope that hereafter we shall be able to find a more desirable object, either by an amendment of the constitution limiting and qualifying the enormous executive power, and especially the veto, or by increased majorities in the two houses of congress. Let us not, by any wise and sagacious policy, let us not, by any law, the president's objections notwithstanding.

This seems to me to be the course now incumbent upon us to pursue; and by conforming to it, whatever may be the result of the measures now in progress or in contemplation in relation to a new attempt to establish a bank, we shall go home bearing no self-reproaches for neglected or abandoned duty.

FISCAL BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

REMARKS OF MR. WISE, OF VIRGINIA.
On the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States, delivered in the house of representatives, in committee of the whole on the state of the union, on Friday, August 6th, 1841.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, having concluded his remarks on the 16th section of the bill.

Mr. WISE rose and said: Mr. Chairman, the main part of my remarks is done, and done in such a manner that I could not write it myself. The gentleman who has just concluded to use the language of his own compliment to me on the distribution bill—has asked this compromise 16th section from stem to stern; he will let neither again, nor tieing, nor bulk; will be hardly necessary for me to survey the wreck of that part of this bill which his argument has left behind. But I have in view other matter, and will proceed to touch upon as much of it as Shrevebury will allow. I would give the per diem of the members for two hours instead of one.

As to the power of congress to incorporate a national bank I have no scruples. I never had. At the very beginning of my public life I met the question without any, the least concealment, without the aid of secret and double-deal. I met it in a district where the issue was at first doubtful, and in a state which has always been certainly opposed to my opinions. These opinions have been expressed at various times, in private and in public, in season and out of season, and particularly at the extra session of 1837, when the independent treasury bill was debated in congress. I then took occasion to avow both the constitutionality and expediency of a national bank, and these I say in advance upon the intelligence and virtue of the people whom I represented.

The proofs upon which I relied were: history, contemporaneous exposition, the expedience of the country, and the letter and spirit of the constitution. Upon these I can now only touch. In history in general I have very little faith. But the proofs of history of this question are irrefragable. The facts are too recent and too well known to be doubted or misunderstood, and the witness to them too high and too sacred to be impeached. We know what was done before the constitution was formed, what was done at its formation, and what has occurred since. The constitution is in our hands, and the men who made it are still with us. It was formed, made the first bank charter. They were not men who said one thing and meant another. They were not partisans, but patriots. They were Washingtons, Madisons and Franklins—fathers of the country, fathers of the constitution, fathers of science and knowledge, to whom the Father of the Gods, handed down from Heaven the very lightning of his power! I firmly abide by the exposition of such men—none of whom ever contradicted themselves on this question, except those who at first opposed and afterwards sanctioned the exercise of this power to charter a bank. And their acts and construction of their own works have ever since been confirmed by all the sanctions of every succeeding generation, by the approbation of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of government, and by the uniform acquiescence of the popular will under the law. If the constitution was doubtful, this was ever enough for my conviction. But I never had any difficulty in deciding under the constitution itself.

In 1837, I presented all the arguments, old and new, upon the constitutional question. I do not propose to discuss them again now. Nothing new has ever been added to the arguments of 1791. But one view of reading one clause in the constitution, a little different from, in being more comprehensive than, that of others, I will barely touch.

The old postulate are—

1st. Every power granted to congress and every duty imposed upon congress is specified, and that the means to execute the powers and to perform the duties are not specified. They are undefined, and left to the sound discretion of congress restrained only by the words "necessary and proper." Congress has the option of determining whether to adopt the best adapted to any or all granted powers or ends, "necessary" to their accomplishment or exercise, and "proper"—that is, not uncongenial or inconsistent with the salute and form of our government. And to give "necessary" an absolute or indispensable meaning would be to destroy all option of means whatever.

2d. A specific enumeration of means was wisely avoided, or, rather, never vainly attempted. For such an enumeration would have been infinite and have required Omniscience itself to embrace all the means to suit all the ends and powers and duties of the government, throughout all times and emergencies, and their endless vicissitudes.

3d. As to these means, too, congress was expressly made independent, or self-dependent. As far as it was given any power, so far was it made to depend upon the means of its own creation to exert that power.

4th. To incorporate a national bank is not in itself a substantive power, but is a use absolutely incidental to great substantive powers, and ends of legislation "necessary and proper" to their execution or accomplishment.

The powers granted to congress to which this means of a national bank is usually made to attach are—

- 1st. To lay and collect taxes, &c.
- 2d. To borrow money, &c.
- 3d. To regulate commerce, &c.
- 4th. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, &c.

And the chief duty of congress to which it attaches it, to make "all duties, imposts and excises uniform throughout the United States."

Such are the powers, and duty of congress. And the clause of the constitution which I read differently from most others is that which concludes the 8th section of the first article:

"And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

Now, here, sir, most gentlemen stop in their railing, and their argument too, on this question. They never touch the subsequent and most important part of the constitution, and most important part of this clause which follows: "And all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." Mark this clause throughout—"And all other powers." There are prevent the passage of laws which might bring the consequences of constructively treason down upon the citizen. The tariff controversy in South Carolina might illustrate this. Again: the marshal is but a minister of justice. He has no province to judge, but must execute merely. So even with a president of the United States. Under an existing law, passed already, he is merely an executive officer. He has no power to judge whether an existing law be constitutional. He is sworn to take care that the laws, no matter what may be his opinion about their validity or the decisions respecting them, are faithfully executed. The inferior judges even in the courts, and the succeeding supreme judges, are in principle bound by the decisions of the courts during the existence of a law to be in. If a president were to assume to annul and reverse, by refusing to execute, the decisions of the congress and of the supreme court, under laws in operation and not expired, he would unquestionably be guilty of usurpation. But when the law has expired, has ceased to exist, is it then binding on the president? any, even on the citizen or the marshal? Could any one then execute it, or be punished for not executing it? No, certainly not. No, certainly not. Then the question arises, when it is again proposed to pass it, are the decisions under its prior existence to bind any one concerned in its passage? They may, as persuasive or argumentative authorities, be the basis of the law proposed, but that is expired precisely, but they are no otherwise obligatory. The question then becomes a new question. It is not a question as to the execution of the law, but as to its creation. When a new bank charter is proposed to the president of the United States, he is asked—not whether he will resist the legislative and judiciary departments, but whether he approves of the passage of the law—not whether the law shall be executed, but whether he will give his sanction to its being. After a bill has been passed, is it not the province of the president, or the citizen, or the mere ministerial officer, to adjudicate and decide upon the question of its constitutionality; but, when a bill is proposed, not, and the president is asked to support the constitution, is bound to decide whether he approves or not, and, if not, in the language of the constitution, "he shall return it with his reasons."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, treated these "Tyler" too, these scrupulous republican abstractions, with much liberality, and yielded them, at least, perfect freedom. He released them from the obligation of conscience and the constitution, to him, that is, to the president, the object of the decisions of a majority? But my colleague, (Mr. BOTT), carried this doctrine much further. I confess he was novel and original, quite so, on this point. He laid down the proposition, however, that the president is sworn to give his assent, opinion, and official too, to the decision of the supreme court of the United States, under the previous law. He says that the president "has no right of thought" on the question of constitutionality—this doctrine is no less extraordinary than the face of the constitution. My colleague was led into this gross absurdity by failing simply to distinguish between the oath to "execute the office of president," &c. prescribed by article 24, section 1st of the constitution, and the duty imposed by article 26, section 3d, that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." By failing too, to discriminate between faithfully executing laws already passed, and announcing laws yet to be passed, and waiting for his approval. Now, the "office of president of the United States" requires, under section 7th of article 1st, that, when a bill "shall have passed the house of representatives and the senate," it "shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the president of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it shall have originated." &c. But, when a law, by article 24, section 2d, it needs not his approval, it beyond his disapproval, when the "shall take care that it be faithfully executed." The constitution is plain in its distinction between the passage of a law and the execution of a law. In the one case, if he approves, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it. He is not left the option even of transcending the ten days, to allow it to become a law by the lapse of the time limited for the return of a bill. He must exercise his judgment, or he may be presumed to have approved of the passage of a law? But he must execute a law already passed, whether he approve it or not; for, in that case, it is not his province to judge, either for approval or disapproval. It was under these plain restrictions, undoubtedly, that Mr. Jefferson agreed to a bill for a branch bank at New Orleans. There the act was in the nature of an act to execute an already existing law. It was to extend the benefits of the bank of the United States, already in being, to a portion of the people who were entitled equally to them; and when, too, as I have shown, he could not do less than faithfully execute an existing law, of the validity of which it was not his province to judge. Of a like nature was his approval of a law to punish the forgery and counterfeiting of the notes of the bank. And as to Mr. Gallatin's report, made two days only before he went out of office, it is sufficient to say that the secretary of the treasury was then, and he is now, a legislator, not a judge, who reported to congress and not to the president, and was one over whom he could take no control, without being guilty of usurpation and tyranny.

Certainly it is thus these distinctions are canonized in the republicanism. By no decision of a majority in congress, or of a majority of the court, under a prior law now expired, can be considered as binding upon the president as his oath to support the constitution, and his judgment that any law which you may propose for his sanction is unconstitutional. I would not presume, if I knew them, to quote his opinions now; but I do know what his opinions were in 1818, and that opinion is exactly in point upon the questions I am now discussing. First, as to the constitutionality of a branch in his judgment; and, secondly, as to the binding obligation of a law chartering such an institution. His views on both are comprehensively embraced in a single sentence:

"House of representatives, Feb. 18, 1818. The committee of the whole, the resolution submitted by Mr. Johnson, of Va. being under consideration—Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to report a bill to repeal the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States,' passed April 10, 1816."

"Mr. Tyler said: The question whether it be proper to direct a scire facias against the bank divides itself into two heads of inquiry. First, whether the charter has been so violated as to constitute a forfeiture? And, if so, it is expedient to exact the forfeiture? The decision of the first would preclude us from an inquiry into the second. For, as, inasmuch as I believe the creation of this corporation to be unconstitutional, I cannot, without a violation of my oath, hesitate to repair the breach thus made in the constitution, when an opportunity presents itself of doing so without violating the public faith." "But believing, also, that it is expedient to put it to the test, and let the government see the result of liberty to follow up that inquiry, I propose to express to you my views on that subject."

His last words were, in this speech: "Let me say what I may, and let the consequences be what they will." Mr. SKRAGAN, we are told, followed him, and must have heard what he said. And this opinion he has never changed or recanted, as far as I know or can ever see or hear.

(Here Mr. Wise was cut off by the hour ring, and what follows is what he would have said, had he been permitted to proceed.)

The veto power, I should think, could not be held by one of those opinions, unchanged, to be a mere ministerial act, or even an executive act only, involving no power or function of judgment, no assent or dissent of the mind or conscience of one acting under an oath to support the constitution, and bound imperatively to approve or disapprove a proposed law. I observe that the veto power is inserted in the 7th section of the 1st article of the constitution, which prescribes the legislative powers, and is long antecedent in that instrument to the clause which prescribes the executive power. Whether it be legislative or executive, though, in its nature, it involves, equal the constitutionality or expediency either of a law, a duty to approve or disapprove, and a free and full right of judgment and discretion in the president. That right of judgment, in any official sense or action, is gone from him as soon as the proposed measure becomes a law. And the very purpose of the veto power is to prevent the constitution from becoming a majority. Why should a majority, then, be set up to overrule the president, even if there was a majority?

But we are told that this bill does respect the constitutional power of the president, and that the republicans of the ruling party who deny the power of congress to incorporate a national bank. We are told that it contains a compromise. A compromise! What is that? Something which I always dread—something which I have never before been obliged to consider. It is to the strong, with the reserved privilege to the stronger side not to keep the faith, even at that rate of advantage. It is something which I never advised a client to accede to unless he had a case, to have the weaker side, and to be bound to the stronger, was to be sure to get a right in which he had no interest "apart into the difference" in his favor. It means always, at least that something is yielded on both sides. Now, pray tell me how can a constitutional power—which exists or don't exist at all—be divided into parts, and partly yielded and partly denied? It is an entirety. It exists or don't exist. How can it—the mere naked question of power—be yielded in part and not to be yielded in the whole? I can't and never could solve that question. Before you can divide or apportion any thing, you must admit that thing to exist. Well, how is it with this 16th rule of the bill?

"16. The power of said corporation shall establish one competent office of discount and deposit in any state in which two thousand shares shall have been subscribed or may be held, whenever, upon application of the legislature of each state, congress may by law require the same. And the said directors may also establish one or more competent offices of discount and deposit in any territory or district of the United States, and in any state, with the assent of said directors, and when established, the said office or offices shall be only withdrawn or removed by the said directors, prior to the expiration of this charter, with the previous assent of congress: Provided, in respect to any state which shall not, at the first session of the legislature thereof, hold after the passage of this act, by resolution or other usual legislative proceeding, unconditionally assent or dissent to the establishment of such office or offices within it, such assent of the said state shall be thereafter presumed, and, when established, the charter, whenever it shall become necessary and proper, for carrying into execution any of the powers granted by the constitution, to establish an office or offices in any of the states whosoever, and the establishment thereof shall be directed, to wit, it shall be the duty of the said directors to establish such office or offices accordingly."

1st. The directors shall establish the branch in any state where there are 2,000 shares, whenever, upon application of the legislature of each state, congress may by law require the same. And the power is in congress undivided. A state may apply for its exercise.

2d. And the directors may establish branches in any state, territory, or district, with the assent of such state, territory, or district, and of the legislature, or its creature, the corporation; and the assent is in this state.

3d. Branches thus established can only be withdrawn or removed with the previous assent of congress. Hence the power to do is still in congress, or its corporation, and the power to undo received, too, to congress.

4th. The states are graciously given the time at the first session of the legislature to assent to this act to unconditionally assent or dissent, or to assume to be presumed. Why should dissent not be presumed by those who deny the power? A man, whose right I deny totally, gives me notice that if, by a given time, I do not dissent, he will presume to do something, he will presume my assent to his right to my land or other property. Am I bound to assent or dissent, either conditionally or unconditionally? And if I am bound to do neither, will the omission to do either give his presumption the right he claims? And are the states bound to do either act, conditionally or unconditionally? If not, will their omission to do either confer a constitutional power on this government which it does not possess? Can even the assent, unconditional, and once having and irrevocable, confer a power which the constitution does not confer already? But the dissent must be unconditional, or the assent will be presumed. And yet,

5th. It is provided at last, after all this complex conditional and unconditional assent or dissent, or assent to be presumed, that "whenever it becomes necessary and proper, congress may by law compel the directors to establish branches in any of the states whosoever, or even those in which there is no assent, within the time allowed, should unconditionally dissent. Was there ever such an absurd bunch of contradictions strung together?"

"First it is what and then it won't. Then it does and then it don't."

And after a hurly-burly of assent and dissent, unconditional and conditional, or assent to be presumed, enough to make a head ache—if it last through out of the dizzy maze by asserting the unlimited, unlimited, absolute power in congress to establish the bank and its branches where it pleases, holds unconditionally, and what more would you say of an Irish argument I heard in its support?

"It either gives the power or it does not give the power. If it gives the power, why it gives the power; and if it doesn't give the power, why it doesn't give the power. And what more would you say? Surely you're unreasonable if you can't be satisfied with neither view, when there are some of us who are satisfied with either view, no come in, and be united upon a proposition which must please all, for it's either or neither of what you would have, or it's all you would have, or just nothing at all, at all!"

Now such a proposition as this pays no respect whatever to the intelligence or the honesty and sincerity of those who shun the power to congress to charter a bank. On its face it presumes hard conscience or a soft head in the bosom or on the shoulders of those to whom it is addressed, as even a compromise upon which cannot be so easily pronounced. For myself, having no scruples about the power of congress, I could individually adopt it as a direct assertion of power more strong than the bill would make without it. But I must confess that, did I doubt of its wisdom, I cannot be so easily persuaded. For myself, having no scruples about the power of congress, I could individually adopt it as a direct assertion of power more strong than the bill would make without it. But I must confess that, did I doubt of its wisdom, I cannot be so easily persuaded. For myself, having no scruples about the power of congress, I could individually adopt it as a direct assertion of power more strong than the bill would make without it. But I must confess that, did I doubt of its wisdom, I cannot be so easily persuaded.

I had resolved to imitate the example of Mr. Madison, and to sanction a charter, I would veto this bill with this clause in it, lest the world and posterity might suppose, as they certainly would, either that I had not intellect enough to discover its patent absurdity, or that I had a conscience patient enough to catch at such a pretext to evade a solemn oath. I can well excuse the course of Mr. Madison, signing as he did no dubious charter as to the power; but I never could trust either his honesty or his sincerity of that man who would veto this bill without this clause, for reasons of constitutional scruple, and yet sign it for the reason of the insertion of this clause.

I cannot regard it as inserted in good faith. If the bill be signed, every partisan of the power to incorporate a national bank by congress will be truly assured that it impairs not, denies not, but emphatically asserts that power. And, if it be signed, the president will be arraigned for giving his sanction to a pretended compromise: This is to be the effect of it, and I will not give it the least toleration or countenance. Let what will come, I will not treat any man, whom I have elected to lay down his known public and published constitutional opinions and conscientious scruples, with such gross injustice, or torture him with any such cruel stain, as that of this bill with this clause in its provisions. Sir, I would, perhaps, be tempted to say, if I were here, but I would not and will not steal the powers of the constitution. Nor will I be participus criminis in the act. Pass the bill, and let it go to the president. Its fate, I hope, will soon be known. But whether that may be, it will become a law, or be vetoed without my vote.

Now, like Giles of old, may be reproached with having denied the abstractions of Virginia, and yet with having yielded practical obedience to them; so like Giles of old, may be said to have denied that practical obedience. But let me say to my colleague, (Mr. STUART), that if Giles was punished for denying the abstraction of instructions—a doctrine which I never heard any Virginian dispute as an abstraction before, even those who yielded practical obedience to its mandates from his mother state—with how many more stripes shall he be punished who not only denies, but denies, all her cherished abstractions—all the tracts of her foul soil—and that, too, in a land of strangers! Sir, my colleague (Mr. STUART) excepted to the gentleman from N. Carolina (Mr. SAUNDERS) saying that in 1816 the constitutional question was not raised. He very properly replied that a constitutional question always rises of itself, without being raised. That is true; I agree with him that, not like Samuel, it requires no Witch of Endor to weave her magic wand to raise it up before the consciences and minds of the free lovers of the Union. But I say to those, Sir, who, when it does rise up before them, habitually cry it down! down! and those who will not permit others to raise it up on its feet without upbraiding them with the federal scold of "abstraction!"

Abstraction! I take that name—I will adopt it, and write it in my book of books. Let it be abused and denounced and derided by those who have been overcome before now by the principle it imports—the great and mighty and indomitable principle of constitutional republicanism! Partisan know the value of hard names. Republicanism has borne more opprobrium than this—it has been called Jacobinism, and democrats have been called red-meat-eaters and even infidels and atheists! This nickname of modern times is not half so bad as those applied to it of old, when it was triumphant, as it will be again. Under its real name none dare assail it, and this gives its power to assist still among the people. Abstractions can well bear a name which, in terms, imports that they are those who can and will die for principle—and that is the meaning of the reproach in these degenerate days to Virginia.

Let my colleague take care of his health, for I warn him that he will be sick of this nickname before he is done with it. Does he mean, and those with whom he acts mean, that the name of "voting" is henceforth dropped? Be it so. We will recognize, if he will have it so, and go before the sovereign people under the less imposing and the opposing names of "abstractions" on the one side and "realism" on the other; the former "the cognomen of constitutional republicanism," the latter of national republicanism—the former representing the doctrines and principles of 1789, of state sovereignty and popular rights, and the latter the doctrine of consolidated and centralization. In this contest I take my side, and am "an abstractionist." I glory in the name, and confident of the issue, I appeal only to the old republicans to rally!

TWENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

August 19. Mr. Morehead presented a memorial from some merchants in Louisville, Kentucky, stating that they had made large orders of coffee, not anticipating any duty, and asking that that article may be exempt from duty.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. Wright, was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of the commissioned officers employed in the revenue cutter service of the United States; and that the committee on the same matter that commissioned officers in the naval service of the United States are appointed; and also of prescribing by law a just and proper rank to between them and the officers of the navy when both are employed together upon the same service; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise at the next session of congress.

Mr. Morehead and senator on the same matter committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the nature and extent of disturbances in the gallery of the senate, in two instances this session, viz: the passage of the fiscal bill, and the reading of the president's veto on said bill; and also of the disturbance at or near the president's house the night ensuing said veto, and also the measures that may be necessary to prevent the different departments of government from violent molestation at the gallery taken up.

Mr. Merrick thought it was not the appropriate business of a committee of this body, to investigate disorderly proceedings that might have taken place in this city; it belonged to the authorities, and if the law not sufficient power for this purpose congress ought to pass the requisite laws for their assistance. It was also inappropriate, and unnecessary to go back and inquire into past disturbances, which had been settled by the law, and which had passed over; it might be proper to take measures to prevent future occurrences of this kind, in the senate galleries or lobbies.

Mr. Woodbury advocated the resolution.

Mr. Clay, Mr. Preston and others, briefly gave their views, concurring in the importance of necessary laws to ensure peace at the seat of government, and security to the public officers.

The resolution was then laid on the table, to next session.

Mr. Davis gave notice that he should on Saturday renew his motion to go into the consideration of executive business.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, hoped that the land bill would be brought to-day, or at farthest to-morrow. If they were going into executive session on Saturday he hoped the final vote on the bill would be taken at once.

Mr. Smith, (with his hands full of slips of paper), I have only two amendments to offer myself.

The land bill was then taken up—the question pending being the amendment of Mr. Fulton to make the distribution of the net proceeds according to the ratio of representation in congress.

After a few remarks from Mr. Fulton the question was taken on his amendment, and lost by a tie vote; yeas 18, nays 21.

Mr. Sewer then moved to amend the bill so as to declare that all the public land which had been in market for twenty years and remained unsold should revert to the states.

On this proposition a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Benton, Linn, Sewer and others took part, when the bill was taken and decided in the negative; yeas 15, nays 30.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, then moved to amend the bill by extending the graduation principle to it.

This was debated by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, Benton, Linn, and Mr. Woodbury, when the question was taken on its adoption and decided in the negative; yeas 18, nays 27.

Mr. Benton rose with his hand full of amendments which he proposed to offer. How stands the time by our show-busby clock? Is it not the hour for taking up the veto? Or are we to have another postponement? He hoped the land bill would be passed over informally.

Which was done; and the senate took up the special order, being the executive veto on the bill chartering the fiscal bank of the United States, which subject occupied the attention of the senate till a late hour, as stated in our brief report of yesterday, inserted in the last Register, page 395.

August 20. Mr. Buchanan presented a remonstrance from the board of trade of Philadelphia, against the passage of a bankrupt law, retrospective in its operation.

The bill to revive and extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, as amended by the house of representatives, was taken up, and, after a few explanatory remarks from Mr. Morehead, and a reply to the bill by Mr. Benton, the question was taken on concurring in the amendments of the house, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bates, Berrien, Chastie, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Macon, Merrell, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White—34. NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, McRoberts, Pierce, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright—14.

Mr. Calhoun presented the proceedings and resolutions of the citizens of the District of Columbia, Virginia, condemning the measures of the present extra session of congress, a national bank, distribution, &c. and applauding the honorable course of Messrs. Wiza, Gales, Hunter and Audrey, representatives from that state, in their opposition to the public business, and the vigilance with which they have guarded against the deleterious measures of the session; also, declaring the unconstitutionality of a national bank, and expressing their earnest desire that its injurious effect to the country would be arrested by a veto from the president.

Mr. Calhoun expressed his concurrence in the resolutions, and briefly adverted to the ruinous consequences of all banks to the country, expressing his joy at the veto of the present extra session of congress, that had been passed at this extra session. After some further remarks by Messrs. Benton and Archer, the proceedings were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The distribution and pre-emption bill was again taken up.

Mr. King offered an amendment to deduct from the proceeds of the lands before distribution, the Indian annuities, expenses of Indian treaties, &c. now due.

Mr. King advocated the amendment, contending that all these expenses were justly chargeable to the lands, and that no distribution should take place, until they were paid from the proceeds. The bill was delivered, and proposed to distribute the net proceeds while in reality, the gross proceeds of the lands were to be divided.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, hoped this amendment would not be adopted. Other amendments of a similar character had already been rejected. The lands were now creditors to the government to a large amount, and their proceeds justly belonged to the states. He referred to the numerous amendments that had been offered, and the delay two weeks that had already taken place in the consideration of this bill. He thought the majority owed it to themselves and the country not to debate the various amendments longer, but merely to vote, and for that part he intended to finish the amendments, to-day, before they adjourned.

After further remarks by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Woodbury, Wright and Allen, the amendment was rejected; yeas 22, nays 24.

Mr. Benton moved an additional section to the bill, providing that the states shall not take place till all debts incurred at this session of congress shall be paid.

Mr. Benton briefly explained the propriety of this amendment. It was also advocated by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, and then rejected—yeas 20, nays 26.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment, to limit the operation of the act to five years. This was negative. Yeas 19, nays 26.

Mr. McRoberts moved to strike out the proviso, that "no person who shall quit or abandon his residence on his own land, to reside on any public lands in the same state or territory, shall acquire any right of pre-emption under this act."

This, after brief remarks by Mr. McRoberts, was rejected—yeas 19, nays 26.

Mr. Allen offered an amendment, providing that no distribution should take place till the means of the treasury were adequate to the demands of the government, and the payment of the taxation on salt and coffee. This was rejected—yeas 18, nays 23.

At 9 o'clock, the senate adjourned, after having been in session eleven hours.

August 21. Mr. Rives presented the plan of Alexander Hamilton for a national bank; which was laid on the table.

Mr. Walker presented a memorial from citizens of Lynchburg, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. Tullidge presented a memorial from citizens of New York, in favor of a bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. Tappan, on leave, introduced a joint resolution to adjourn congress on Monday, the 30th August; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Lin, requesting the president to give notice to the British government, under the convention of 1827, for the joint occupation of Oregon, &c. was then taken up.

Mr. Morehead said there was one subject of great importance connected with this matter, which, at a proper time, he meant to submit. He thought our Indian relations were becoming of more and more interest every day, and would require a separate and distinct department of the government, in order that they might be extensively and variously conducted.

Mr. M. moved to amend the resolution so as to direct the committee on foreign relations "to inquire into the expediency of requesting the president," which having been agreed to, the resolution was adopted.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the general order, being the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states.

This bill was discussed as some length by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, King, McRoberts, Walker, Buchanan, Prentiss, Evans and others, when it was reported to the senate.

Mr. Berrien moved to amend the bill by inserting: Provided, also, That if the rate of duty on imported articles shall be so regulated by law, as, after the 20th June, 1842, to increase said rate of duty beyond 20 per cent. ad valorem, to be computed according to the provisions of the act of 2d of March, 1833, the duties on the proceeds of the public lands provided for by this act shall cease during the existence of such rate of duty, and shall be renewed whenever such rate of duty shall be reduced to 20 per cent. unless prohibited by the other provisions of the act."

This proposition was debated by Messrs. Benton, Bates, McRoberts, Walker, White, Morehead, Prentiss, Berrien and others, when

Mr. Rives moved to amend the amendment to the following effect:

"Strike all out after the word provided to 1833, inclusive, and insert, 'That if a higher duty than 20 per cent. as established by the act of the 2d of March, 1833, shall be laid on any article to be levied after the 30th of June, 1842.'"

This proposition was discussed by Messrs. Merrick, Berrien, Woodbury and Rives, when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, White, Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—24.

The question then recurred on the original proposition of Mr. Berrien, pending which, on motion of Mr. Morehead, the senate adjourned.

August 23. The chair laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of the treasury, covering a report from the general land office, made in compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 15th inst. calling for the amount of lands surveyed and ready for sale, &c. since March, 1841.

After a few observations from Mr. Benton, and a brief reply from Mr. Smith, of Indiana, it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from citizens of Philadelphia engaged in manufacturing, asking that a duty might be imposed on chloride of lime and bleaching powders. Mr. B. said the memorial gave reasons at length why those articles should not be exempted, and he therefore moved to have it printed for the use of the senate; which motion was agreed to.

Also, another memorial in relation to the same subject; which he would move to be laid on the table.

Mr. Mangum, from the committee on naval affairs reported the bill from the house making appropriation for the purchase of naval ordnance and naval stores, without amendment, and moved that it be made the order for Wednesday next; which motion was agreed to.

Also, a memorial from the same committee, the joint resolution for the purchase of water-rotted hemp for the use of the navy of the United States.

This resolution was taken up in committee of the whole, and after having been discussed by Messrs. Benton, Prentiss, Buchanan, Calhoun and Woodbury, its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

The joint resolution submitted by Mr. Tappan in relation to the adjournment of congress on Monday, the 30th August, was taken up when Mr. Mangum moved to lay it on the table. The question having been taken by yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative; yeas 28, nays 21.

Mr. Rives said he had some days since given notice that he should submit a motion to go into executive session. There was now some important business before them, and he would submit that motion now. The motion was lost; yeas 23, nays 21.

Mr. King gave notice that he should make a similar motion to-morrow.

Mr. Benton renewed the motion to go into executive session, and after some conversation, it was decided out of order.

After a few observations, he proceeded to the consideration of the general order, being the bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the states; the amendment of Mr. Berrien still pending, as published in the proceedings of yesterday—

Mr. Berrien moved to modify his amendment; which was unanimously agreed to, so as to read—

"That if at any time during the existence of this act there should be an imposition of duties on imports inconsistent with the provisions of the act of March 2, 1833, entitled 'an act to modify the act of 14th February, 1832, and all the acts imposing duties on imports,' and beyond the rate of duty fixed by that act, to wit: 20 per centum on the value of such imports, or any of them, then the distribution provided in this act shall be suspended, and shall so continue until the cause of its suspension shall be removed, when, if not prevented by other provisions of this act, such distribution shall be renewed."

The words "to wit, 20 per centum on the value of such imports or any of them," were inserted in the amendment at the suggestion of Mr. Allen.

This proposition, prior to the modification of Mr. Allen, was the subject of a debate of some length, in which Messrs. Berrien, King, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Walker, Linn, Huntington, Woodbury and Benton participated.

The question was then taken on the amendment, as modified, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Porter, Prentiss, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, Walker—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Benton, Buchanan, Choate, Dixon, Evans, Huntington, Linn, Miller, Prentiss, Sturgeon, Tappan, White, Williams, Woodbridge, Wright, Young—18.

Mr. Lin then moved the amendment offered by him in committee of the whole, to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands to the national defence.

Mr. Lin offered his views in support of the amendment, and was briefly replied to by Mr. Smith.

Mr. Benton also supported the amendment.

The question having been taken, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Pierce, Sevier, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Linn, McRoberts, Miller, Morehead, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—29.

Mr. Woodbury then offered an amendment to the effect that the distribution should cease when any loan should be required.

On this proposition a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Woodbury, King and others participated, when the question was taken and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Nicholson, Pierce, Rives, Sevier, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—26.

Mr. Tappan announced to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next, on which motion he demanded the yeas and nays, when the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Rollins, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—29.

Several other amendments were offered, on all of which yeas and nays were taken, though none of them were adopted.

Mr. Calhoun moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Woodbury moved that the senate adjourn: for the motion 21, against it 23.

The question was then taken on the engrossment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Nicholson, Pierce, Preston, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

And the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed.

The senate then held a short executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

August 24. A message was announced from the house of representatives, stating that they had passed "an act to provide for the better collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenue, by means of a corporation to be styled the fiscal corporation of the United States."

The bill was then taken up and read by its title; and, on the question, shall it be read a second time? it was decided in the affirmative: yeas 18, nays 17.

The second reading was asked for then; when the chair declared that it required the unanimous consent of the senate.

No objection having been stated, the chair directed the secretary to read the bill a second time in its title; and when the secretary had read half through—

Mr. Allen objected to the reading.

The chair explained.

Mr. Tullidge made the issue for objecting had gone by; the chair had stated that it required the unanimous consent of the senate, and no objection having been made the secretary had proceeded to the reading.

Mr. Calhoun stated that the practice heretofore had been to put the question, "shall this bill have its second reading now?" which required the unanimous consent of the senate; if no objection was made, then the secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. Allen replied. That was precisely what was done in this case.

After some further brief observations, the point was yielded; and Mr. Tappan moved to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. Rives then hoped the motion would not prevail. He asked senators to consider the importance of this matter, and to reflect that it was the incumbent duty of congress to make provision for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenue.

Such had been done; he alluded to the bill which had failed by the disagreement between the executive and legislative branches as to the constitutionality of the measure; and hence the money was left without any other care or control than that of the executive.

He then presented that measure to the consideration of the senate, and prayed senators before they took any step to defeat the will of the other branch that they would consider well the consequences not providing some measure for the safe-keeping of the revenue of the country.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the vote on the postponement resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Montau, Nicholson, Pierce, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbridge—24.

Mr. Berrien then moved that the bill be referred to a select committee of five. The other select committee had expired.

Mr. Clay rose to second this motion, and to express the hope that the motion would prevail. The facts as stated by the senator from Georgia were correct—the committee that reported the original bill no longer existed. He had no desire to have anything particularly to do with the bill. The friends of the measure he hoped might be allowed to concoct something that would suit the wishes of the country.

Mr. Buchanan would certainly vote for the reference to a select committee, for he did not wish the senator from Kentucky to be placed at the head of a committee to take the charge of this kite-flying fiscalty: there was but one step between the sublimity and the ridiculous; this bill had taken that step, and he did not wish the senator from Kentucky, against his own wishes to be connected, with it.

The motion having been agreed to, the bill was referred to a select committee of five, consisting of Messrs. Berrien, Evans, Archer, Matthews and Hamilton.

Mr. King, then moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business. He said it seemed to be the understanding yesterday that they were to go into executive session to-day to dispose of some of the business that had been postponed.

Mr. Clay hoped not: there was nothing connected with the executive session that might not be delayed for some days. The land bill was important and should be disposed of once. He mentioned that several gentlemen desired to be heard on the subject, and those who wished to speak on the bill, if ready, he would prefer that they should go on.

Mr. King withdrew his motion, the bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands was put on its third reading; when

Mr. Cullison rose, and in a speech of near two hours, opposed the bill on the ground of its being unconstitutional, inexpedient and impolitic.

Mr. Archer followed in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and spoke until entirely exhausted, and had to give way before concluding his remarks.

The senate then went into executive session, and after some time spent therein, adjourned.

August 25. Mr. Shapen presented a memorial from the manufacturers of glass in the city Pittsburgh, asking that the articles used in the manufacture of that article may be exempted from duty.

Mr. Cullison then presented a memorial from the citizens of a meeting held in Petersburg, Virginia, protesting against the measures of the present administration, and expressing a hope that the president would withhold his assent from the land bill if passed. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Tappan moved to take up the joint resolution for the adjustment of both houses of congress on Monday, the 30th of August next, on which motion he was adjourned to the next day.

The question having been taken, it was decided in the negative: yeas 19, nays 22.

Mr. King moved to add two members to the select committee appointed yesterday by the chair, to which the bank bill from the house had been referred.

After some remarks by Messrs. King, Benton and Walker, on the formation of the committee, and a reply by the chair, giving his reasons for the character of the committee, he said he would add a note in Jefferson's Manual: Mr. King withdrew his motion.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, and to distribute the proceeds of the public lands; when

Mr. Archer rose and finished the argument he commenced yesterday, in favor of the general principles of the bill.

Mr. Woodbury followed in a speech of very considerable length, against the whole system of distribution, as unjust, unequal and injurious, and closed his remarks with the expression of an opinion that the president would withhold his assent from a measure clearly so unconstitutional as that of the bank charter.

Messrs. Tappan, Serier, Walker, Wright and Woodbury severally addressed the senate at some length, when

Mr. Cullison rose and expressed a desire to deliver his opinion in relation to the subject before the senate; but the late hour and the exhaustion which all must feel, admonished him that he had better defer it until the morning. He then rose and delivered his opinion on the public lands would ascend to the committee.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, said he felt deeply anxious to press the matter to a final conclusion. He had indulged the hope that they would have been able to have the question that day; but as the hour was late and the senator from Georgia had expressed a wish to be heard, he would consent to the delay, with the understanding that the question should be taken by three o'clock to-morrow.

And then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, August 19. Mr. Jeremiah Brown rose and stated that he had voted yesterday in favor of the passage of the bank law, whereas his vote had been recorded in the negative. He asked that the journal might be so corrected as to conform to the fact. And the journal was amended accordingly.

Mr. Balls rose and asked leave to present a copy of a series of resolutions, adopted, he said, at a very respectable meeting of citizens held in Buckingham county, in the state of Virginia, expressive of their opinion as to the constitutionality and propriety of the establishment of a national bank, and in favor of other measures adopted at this present session of congress.

After some remarks from Mr. B. the resolutions were received, and laid on the table.

Mr. Leane given, Mr. Adams, of Pennsylvania, presented the memorial of Gabriel Adams, and divers other citizens of Pittsburgh, in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of duties on foreign cigars, when, on motion, on motion of Mr. L. referred to the committee on manufactures.

On leave given, Mr. Jones, of Virginia, presented certain resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens in the city of Washington, Virginia, expressive of their opinion against the constitutionality of a bank of the United States, and asserting the right of appeal. The resolutions also express an opinion that that meeting against the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and against the power of congress to lay taxes, &c. for any other purpose than to pay the debts of the United States, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare thereof.

The resolutions were received and laid on the table.

Mr. Pickens, on leave, presented certain memorials from citizens of Ohio, against the constitutionality and expediency of a national bank.

Mr. Cox, on leave given, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to this house, the number of troops stationed at Fort Gibson, in the State of Arkansas, respectively; whether the original location of the latter fort has not been abandoned, and if so, the reasons therefor; and whether, in the judgment of the military force now on that frontier is sufficient to protect the citizens of the state of Arkansas against Indian depredation; and what increase, if any, will be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. Wilmington, on leave, presented certain resolutions from the legislature of Rhode Island, upon the subject of revenue. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On leave given, Mr. Balls, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making appropriations for the funeral expenses of the late president of the United States.

The bill, having been read twice by the title, was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and the bill, and accompanying documents, ordered to be printed.

On leave given, Mr. Grassman introduced a bill in relation to placing the statue of Washington in the rotundo of the capitol; which was read twice.

[The bill authorizes the location of the statue in the rotundo of the capitol as the artist may deem permanently best.]

Mr. G. moved that the bill have its third reading. Some discussion followed, directed to the point of view where the light would best strike the statue, and in which Messrs. Adams, Graham, Mason, of Ohio, Borland, Gilmer, and Cushing participated.

Mr. Cushing then moved that the bill be committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, which had charge of a bill on the same subject heretofore reported by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer), which was agreed to.

Mr. Roads, from the joint committee on enrolled bills, reported that that committee had examined the bill to establish a uniform system of weights and measures throughout the United States, and found the same to be correct. The bill then received the signature of the speaker.

On motion of Mr. Filmor, the house resolved itself into a committee on the state of the union, (Mr. Widman, of Maryland, in the chair), and took up house bill, No. 8, entitled "a bill making appropriations for various fortifications, for armaments, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, which bill had been returned from the senate with certain additional items, to which items certain amendments had been moved committee of ways and means of this house.

The amendments are as follow:
Page 8 of the engrossed bill, after line 21 insert:
"1st. For defensive works and barracks paid for at or near Detroit, Mich
$50,000."

Add to the end of the bill the following:
"2d. For surveys in reference to the in defensibility of the frontier, inland and At $30,000."

3d. For errandages due for roads, harbor riders, where public works and improvement have been made, and the protection of property now on hand at these places, and revenues for surveys, and completing maps issued on or before March 3d, 1839, $40,000."

4th. For defraying the expenses of select purchasing a site for a western, southwest northwestern armory, to be selected by the dent of the United States, the sum of $75,000."

5th. For the construction or armament of armored steamers or other vessels for defence, money, $100,000."

To what amendments of the senate the co llect says adds means of this house propos following amendments:

The committee recommend that the hous cur in the first amendment, with the foll inserted in the bill:

Add thereto the following words:
"For purchase of sites, and for barracks, an fensive works, at or near Buffalo, New $50,000."

For fortifications at the outlet of lake Cham and purchase of site, $75,000."

For defensive works, barracks, and other any buildings, and purchase of site for a de or near the junction of the Matawanack an sub-rivers, Maine, $25,000."

The committee also recommend a non-con resolution to the senate, to the effect, that of the senate, and a concurrence in the fifth amendment.

The amendments were discussed by M
Daniel, of Ohio, the court, President, Mr.
Brown, Prof. Howard, S. Mason, Sprigg,
Perrell, Cushing, Silhouette, Allen, Zane
Eastman, and Tillinghast.

The amendments reported from committee of ways and means to the amend of the senate were agreed to.

And, on motion of Mr. Filmor, the pr of having a vote taken on the house, the amendments of the senate were concurred in.

And the committee rose, and reported the amendments to the house.

A message was received from the presid the United States, by the hands of John Ty his private secretary, informing the house th president had approved and signed a bill auth the recovery of fines and forfeitures, and charter laws and ordinances of Georgetown, justices of the peace.

Also, the bill to extend the time for locatin ginia military land warrants, and return surveys thereon to the general land office.

And then the house adjourned.

Friday, Aug. 20. On leave given, Mr. *K of Maryland, introduced a bill, to amend whom had been referred the joint resolution the senate in relation to the light boats now sta at Sandy Hook and Bartlett's reef, report

And on motion of Mr. K. the resolution wa a third time and passed.

Mr. Gilmer asked leave to present the proc of a meeting of the people of the county of L

The resolutions were received and laid i

K. K. from the committee on comm reported a resolution calling on the presiden full return of officers now employed in the v departments, with a view to reduction of ex tended to the public lands. (See page 411.)

The unfinished business of the morning ha in the following resolution, heretofore offered b
J. G. Floyd.

Resolved, That the president of the United St requested to inform this house, if not in accor with the public interest, whether any officer of the army, or the attorney general of the United States has, since the 4th of March last, been directed to visit the city of New York for any purpose connected with the imprisonment or trial of Alexander McLeod; and if so, to communicate to this house copies of the instructions, and report of any officer and whether, by any executive measures or correspondence, the British government has been given to understand that Mr. McLeod will be released or surrendered.

Mr. Morgan, (who was entitled to the floor) remarking that so long a time had elapsed since he had been entitled to the floor that he had almost forgotten what he intended to say, addressed the house briefly on the subject of the resolution, and especially in reply to remarks heretofore made by his colleague from Ohio, (Mr. Bowne).

Mr. Barnard then obtained the floor, and yielded it to

Mr. Bowne, who rejoined briefly to Mr. Morgan. Mr. Barnard again took the floor, and intimated his desire to address the house, but suggested that, as the morning hour was far advanced, the resolution should go over for to-day.

Mr. Mansell moved to lay the resolution on the table, upon which, on motion of Mr. J. G. Floyd, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The house refused to lay on the table: yeas 79, nays 107.

A message was here received from the senate, informing the house of the failure of the bank bill, in consequence of less than two-thirds of the senate voting for it, on its being returned by the president to the objections of the resolution, and that he had signed the bankrupt bill; and that the senate had concurred with the house in their amendments to the bill rechartering the banks of the District of Columbia.

At the request of Mr. Barnard, the "McLeod resolution" was laid over.

The joint resolution, from the senate, ordering the distribution of copies of the compendium of the census among the states, was then taken up; and after some inquiries and remarks from Mr. Dawson, Fillmore and Williams, it was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

The house took up the bill No. 8, being a bill making appropriations for various fortifications, for ordnance, and for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, which had been reported yesterday from the committee of the whole on the state of the union with the amendments of the senate, and then proceeded to a vote thereon reported by the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Dawson objected to the latter amendments as out of order, incorporating as they did the substance of another bill on the table. A brief debate ensued on the point of order; the speakers, Mr. Dawson, Fillmore and others, the speaker, deciding that the amendments were in order.

Mr. Innes made some remarks on the subject of amendments formerly proposed by him to provide for a western army.

A desultory debate then ensued between Messrs. Irvine, Fillmore, Cove Johnson, Howard and others, as to the order in which the amendments should be voted on.

Messrs. Triplett, Fillmore, Rhett, Tullahoma, and Hunt, remarked upon the amendments.

Mr. Hunt moved the previous question—which was ordered, as well as the yeas and nays.

The house then concurred with the committee in the amendment to the senate's amendment—yeas 124, nays 72.

The house then concurred in the first senate amendment, (appropriating $50,000 for fortifications at Detroit), without a division.

The house refused to concur in the second senate amendment, (appropriating $30,000 to surveys for defense)—yeas 99, nays 101.

The house concurred in the third amendment of the senate without a division.

The fourth amendment was rejected—yeas 79, nays 105.

The fifth amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed. Mr. Irvine moved a reconsideration of all the votes just taken, and half an hour was consumed in taking the yeas and nays on this motion—the house refusing to reconsider—yeas 74, nays 119.

And the amendments, as amended, were ordered to be engrossed and sent to the senate for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on a state of the union, (Mr. Dawson, of Georgia, in the chair), and took up house bill No. 11, being a bill reported from the select committee appointed by this house on the subject of the currency, entitled "a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States."

Mr. Sergeant said that he would state to the committee what he meant to propose to them. The committee would undoubtedly recollect the nature of the bill which had been reported by the committee on the currency some considerable time ago, and which was numbered "fourteen." His intention was now to move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "acting," and inserting what he would send to the effect. His intention, further, was to ask, upon this motion being made and certain amendments which he intended to propose being presented to the committee, that the committee of the rise, in order that he might have the honor of printing of those amendments that they might be laid before the members of the house.—And then, as soon as that was done, he would ask the house to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union for the purpose of taking up the subject.

Mr. Wise rose and expressed his wish that, before any action should be taken on the amendments, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Sergeant] would state the contents of them as briefly and succinctly as he could.

Mr. Gilmer rose, he said, merely to ask that the amendments might be read before they were ordered to be printed. He would then be very glad to state the contents of the amendments to the house, (Mr. Sergeant) might think proper to make. Mr. Charles Brown said that it would be necessary to read the bill and amendments from beginning to end before ordering the amendments to be printed.

The clerk then read bill No. 14, with the amendments proposed by Mr. Sergeant.

Mr. Sergeant said that, as several inquiries had been made of him with regard to this bill he would now make a short statement of its contents in what respects it differed from that recently before the house. He would say, first, that there were two or three verbal errors in this bill, and there were words, in two or three places, which he thought had better have been left out, and which were intended to have been omitted by the committee. There were several gentlemen in the present congress who entertained extreme hostility to the word "bank," as far as he was concerned, he felt every disposition to indulge their feelings, and he had therefore endeavored throughout this bill to avoid using the word "bank." If that word anywhere remained as applicable to the being it was proposed to let it stand. Now, the word "corporation" sounded well, [laughter], and he was glad to perceive it gave pleasure to the house. At all events they had a new word to fight with. Now, the difference between this bill and that which passed this house some days ago would be seen by comparison. The present differed from the other principally in three or four particulars, and there were some other parts of the bill which varied, in some particulars, from that which had been before the house a few days ago. Those differences gentlemen would have no difficulty in discovering and understanding when the bill should have been printed. He would now proceed to answer the inquiries of gentlemen in reference to this bill. Mr. S. then said the following as the substantial points of difference between the two bills:

1. The capital in the former bill was thirty millions, with power to extend it to fifty millions. In this bill twenty-one millions, with power to extend it to thirty five millions.
2. The former bill provided for office of discount and deposit. In this there are to be agencies only.
3. The capital of the corporation are to be confined to buying and selling foreign bills of exchange, including bills drawn in one state or territory and payable in another. There are to be no discounts.
4. The title of the corporation is changed.

Mr. Wise raised the point of order that this bill was, in substance, the same as that which had yesterday been rejected, and that it could not, therefore, be taken up; otherwise the constitutional provision might thus be evaded.

After some conversation, the chairman overruled the objection, on the ground that the measures were not the same, though parts of them might be similar. No appeal being taken, the motion of Mr. Sergeant was put and agreed to. And the committee rose and reported progress on the bill.

Mr. Sergeant moved that the amendments offered by him in committee be printed.

Mr. Williams, of Maryland, moved to amend this bill by adding "and that every part of the amendments which is not literally contained in the original bill proposed to be struck out, shall be printed in Italics."

Mr. Wise moved to amend the amendment by striking out the veto message be printed for the use of the members of this house."

Mr. Lewis Williams said that the house had not got the veto message, and could not, therefore, order the printing of it.

And the previous question was decided.

After some conversation, Mr. W. C. C. Johnson moved the previous question on the motion to print; and there was a second. And the main question (being on the printing) was ordered to be taken.

The amendment of Mr. Williams was voted down. And the motion of Mr. Sergeant was agreed to. So the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Brownson, of Maine, moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday by which the accounts for the funeral expenses of the late president of the United States, Wm. H. Harrison, had been ordered to be paid.

Mr. Stansel moved the previous question; pending which the house adjourned.

Saturday, Aug. 21. The unfinished business of yesterday was the motion of Mr. Brownson, of Maine, to reconsider the vote by which the accounts for the funeral expenses of the late president of the United States, Wm. H. Harrison, had been ordered to be paid.

The immediately pending question was on the demand of Mr. Stansel for the previous question.

Mr. Stansel moved the previous question. And Mr. Brownson, after an explanation from himself and Mr. Botts, withdrew his motion to reconsider.

Mr. Morgan offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That at a clock on Monday next all debate in committee of the whole on the bill (No. 14) to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States" shall cease, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on the amendments then pending; or that may be offered to said bill; and the same shall then be reported to the house with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee. President. That nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting the bill to the house at an earlier hour if it shall think fit.

And Mr. W. moved the previous question.

Mr. C. Johnson moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was rejected, yeas 57, nays 110. After some remarks of an excitable character, the question on the adoption of the resolution was taken, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 116, nays 76.

Whereupon the house, on motion of Mr. Sergeant, again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the subject of the currency, (Mr. Dawson, of Georgia, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of bill No. 14, to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States.

Mr. Sergeant then offered the amendments indicated by him yesterday, first moving to strike out all after the enacting clause.

Mr. S. proceeded to explain the amendments, and the advantages to result from the passage of the bill. Mr. S. spoke to the expiration of the hour, and they resumed his seat, without concluding his remarks.

Mr. Wise obtained the floor, and addressed the committee in opposition to the bill, and on the subject of the veto, the cabinet, &c. &c.

The hour having elapsed, Mr. Turney rose and moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The chairman decided that this motion took precedence over the motion of Mr. Sergeant.

Whereupon, Mr. W. rose, and, being recognized by the chairman, proceeded to address the committee during a second hour.

A question of order arose, which resulted in the decision of the chairman that, the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Turney) being a new motion, and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) having first addressed the chair, and been recognized by it, the latter gentleman was entitled to proceed. No appeal was taken. Mr. W. proceeded in his remarks.

After Mr. W. had closed, Mr. Marshall, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, the committee then rose, and reported progress.

Mr. Prell asked leave to introduce a resolution, declaring that if congress chartered a fiscal agent, it should reserve the power to repeal the same whenever it saw fit.

Objection was made, and the house adjourned.

Monday, Aug. 23. After the reading and correction of the journal, Mr. Arnold, newly elected representative from Illinois, was introduced and sworn in by the speaker.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Dawson, of Georgia, in the chair), and took up house bill No. 14, being a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the fiscal bank of the United States. The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Turney to strike out the enacting clause of the bill,

Mr. Saunders, from the committee on the judiciary, to whom had been referred the resolution from the senate providing for the distribution of the printed returns of the sixth census, reported the same with an amendment, (in relation to the number of copies), which was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed. And the bill having been ordered to a third reading at this time, was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Tillinghast, the house resolved itself into committee on the petition of the union, (Mr. Everett, of Vermont, in the chair).

Mr. Tillinghast moved that the committee take up the joint resolution providing for the distribution of the digest of patents.

Mr. Briggs moved that the committee take up the bill making appropriations for the post office department.

Mr. Gilmer moved that the committee take up the bill providing for placing the statue of Washington in the rotundo of the capitol.

The motion of Mr. Briggs having prevailed, the committee proceeded to the consideration of house bill No. 80 to make appropriations for the post office department. The bill having been read, Mr. Briggs explained the condition of the department, and the necessity with reference to it, of granting this appropriation, upwards of two hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars of which had fallen due prior to and within the quarter ending March 31st, beyond any means in the department to meet the demand.

Mr. Gilmer expressed his concurrence in the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Briggs). That gentleman had made out a clear case of justice and necessity.

Mr. G. offered the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill.

"Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be accounted for by the post office department hereafter, when the condition of its funds shall permit; to be refunded into the treasury, or deducted from any sums which the post office department may heretofore have paid into the treasury."

The debate was continued by Messrs. Roosevelt, J. G. Floyd, Saltonstall, Cress Johnson, Dawson, of Georgia, Cliftenden, Tillinghast, Clifford, Morgan, Hopkins, Bidack, Brown, Briggs and Campbell. The arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts and those of the gentleman from New York on both sides were very similar, and may be generally stated as follows:

The bill was opposed—

1. Because it introduced a new principle, or at least a new practice into the government, viz: paying the debts of the post office department out of the general treasury of the government, instead of keeping it separate, causing its receipts to meet its expenditures; when they were redundant, extending mail facilities; and when they were deficient, curtailing mail facilities.

2. Because it assumed the existence of a debt which was not, and could not be authentically stated, inasmuch as there had not been time to receive the necessary returns in relation to the payment of drafts on postmasters.

3. Because the estimates on which the bill was founded included $150,000 to be retained in the department as a fund to meet contingencies; and it was wrong to drain the treasury to place such a fund at the disposal of the postmaster general.

4. Because the postmaster general differed in opinion from the president, and ought to resign.

5. Because he was incompetent to his office.

6. Because he had three times been rejected by the people of his State.

7. Because he had stopped a Sunday mail between New York and Boston, which looked like an attempt to introduce a system which had once before been pressed by a certain portion of the community, and utterly rejected and put down by public opinion.

8. Because he had carried out a system of proscriptio in the removal of postmasters, contrary to what professions and promises before the election. One postmaster had been appointed because his recommendations stated that he was "a steamboat in politics."

9. Because, by a proper economy, the whole of the present debt might be paid off, as Amos Kendall had paid off a debt of $800,000 entailed upon him by Mr. Barry.

10. Because Amos Kendall was the best postmaster general the country had ever seen since the foundation of the government, and had been removed to make way for the present incumbent.

11. Because, if this debt was once paid out of the treasury, it would introduce a new revolutionary principle, which would eventually be followed, and would lead to great waste and extravagance.

12. Because the treasury was said not to be able to meet the ordinary current expenditures of the government, and how could it bear this additional burden? The loan would have to be increased.

13. Because the contractors, when they made contracts, looked only to the receipts of the department for their security; and, if there were insufficient, they could not complain; they never looked to the treasury for their pay.

14. Because the only control congress has over the postmaster general is to limit his revenues.

15. Because $150,000 had already been appropriated to the post office in Washington.

16. Because the 2 cents allowed to postmasters for the delivery of franked documents amounted to $200,000 a year, and sometimes brought the department in debt to a post office instead of the post office to the department.

The bill was advocated—

1. On the ground that the money was a government debt, undeniably due.

2. That the constitution knew no difference between public debts, whether due from our department or another.

3. That it made no difference to what contractors might have looked at their security, the government was bound for every debt justly and properly contracted by any one of its authorized agents.

4. Because the contractors were suffering for want of the money they had earned—their stock, in some cases, having been detached, in others under execution, and in some cases, actually sold.

5. Because the contractors had exhibited great zeal and fidelity in the discharge of their contracts, and great forbearance and patience under unmerited embarrassment and suffering.

In reply to the arguments on the other side, it was contended—

1. That Mr. Granger was not answerable for this debt, it having been due before he came into office.

2. That the debt could be known and was known very nearly notwithstanding all the returns were not actually in.

3. That the report rested in part on the responsibility of Mr. Whitley, the auditor general of the post office department, whose accuracy, industry and fidelity were above all doubt or suspicion.

4. That Mr. Granger's conduct in removals or appointments had nothing to do with the debts of the department, or the rights of its creditors.

5. That Mr. Granger did not more than his duty in removing improper incumbents.

6. That his rule in removals had been to remove those who were incompetent to discharge political purposes, and made themselves busy politicians at elections.

7. That while some complained of the number removed, more persons complained that so many violent Republicans were still retained in office. (Governor Marcy for one).

8. That there was no more reason the post office department should be kept independent of the treasury than that the navy department or the war department should. And congress might as well refuse to appropriate for the navy department because it did not take prizes enough to support its own expenses, or for the war department because it did not conquer territory enough to pay for its own expenses.

9. Because, when the constitution gave a power to congress to establish post offices and post roads, it impliedly required congress to do so. And if congress did so, it must pay whatever it cost to establish and to keep them up.

10. Because the insufficiency of its revenues no more prevented congress from this duty than would the insufficiency of court fees discharge congress from the duty of establishing courts inferior to the supreme court, and providing for the administration of justice to the people.

11. Because the number of nipsaid mail contractors was very large, being over 400; and the amount due them not less than $497,607, ($300,000 due to one contractor).

12. Because the credit of the government was the honor of the country, and it was disgraceful that men who had faithfully served the public should be ruined by the refusal of government to pay them their just dues.

13. Because to refuse to pay the debt of a department because members of congress had a personal dislike or other objection to the person at the head of the department, was not only open disloyalty, but it was introducing a revolutionary principle, which, if pursued, would destroy the government.

14. As to the discontinuance of a single Sunday mail from the whole of the debt had been discontinued by Mr. Niles, a postmaster general of the gentleman's own politics. The discontinuance of this one route was temporary, and to resist extinction.

15. As to Mr. Granger's having been three times rejected by the people of New York for a state office, so had Mr. Van Buren been three times rejected for the presidency of the union.

16. It is no more than fair, even on the principle that the post office is to be kept independent of the treasury, that the treasury should give the post office this half million, while the treasury has heretofore received from the post office over a million.

17. What evidence is there of a disposition to raise a high tariff, because gentlemen plead that the government should pay a honest debt?

18. The mail contractors have made with the government, therefore the government is bound to pay the money; if the department cannot, the treasury must.

The committee then rose (for want of a quorum), and at a little after 8 o'clock, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Aug. 28. On leave given, Mr. Parmenter presented the petition of Wm. Parker and others for admission free of duty of certain articles used in the manufacture of glass. Also, the petition of C. W. Wood and others, of Ashby, Massachusetts, for the discontinuance of the spirit ration in the United States navy. Referred to the committee on naval affairs.

The speaker, before the house a letter from Wm. W. Weston, esq. mayor of the city of Washington, communicating a copy of the proceedings of a large and highly respectable meeting of citizens, expressive of the opinion of the meeting on the late riotous proceedings of a few disorderly persons, most of them presumed to be non-residents, and of the outrage on the feelings of the president of the United States on the occasion of his rejection of the bank bill. These proceedings are signed by the highly respectable committee appointed by the meeting for the purpose of making known its views and wishes to the president and the two houses of congress, and which consists of Mr. Weston, the mayor, Richard S. Cox, Joseph Bryan, Nathan Townson and John P. Van Ness, esqs. The proceedings were referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Everett, of Vermont, in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for the post office department.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Gilmer to amend the bill by making it the duty of the department to refund the money to the treasury.

Messrs. Gilmer, Cliftenden, Hays, Littlefield and Gordon, made some remarks, when

Mr. Arnold took the floor, and addressed the committee during an hour, in a speech upon the general political condition of parties, upon the political topics which had been introduced in the debate, and in reply to the remarks of Mr. Cress Johnson and other members who had preceded him.

Mr. Stansly replied to Mr. Arnold, and in opposition to the course pursued by Mr. Bolts.

Mr. Bolts followed in explanation, and replied to the remarks of Mr. Stansly.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Proffit, Dawson and Briggs.

Mr. McKay then proposed the following modified proposition as an amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Gilmer).

"That the president of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, in case it is necessary to enable the post office department to meet its present engagements and pay its debts, to cause a sum not exceeding three hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars of the treasury which may be borrowed in execution of the act entitled 'an act authorizing a loan not exceeding the sum of twelve millions of dollars,' approved July 21st, 1841, to be applied to the use of such department for the purposes aforesaid, and to be reimbursable out of the accruing funds of the department; the said money to be accounted for in the manner prescribed in the second section of the 'act to change the organization of the post office department and the funds of the department for the settlement of the accounts thereof,' passed, July 9, 1841."

Mr. McK. trusted, he said, that the separation which had existed twenty years between the funds of the post office department and the funds of the general treasury should still be preserved. And it could only be preserved by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. Briggs briefly opposed the proposition.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Payne, C. Brown, James, of Penn. Cushing, Marshall and Wise, when Mr. Andrews moved that the committee be and they were prevailed the committee rose and reported progress.

And, at a late hour, the house adjourned.
